NATO Assembly Urges Reduction Of Short-Range Western N-Arms

By Joseph Fitchett

THE HAGUE - Legislators from the NATO countries urged their defense ministers Thursday to dismantle significant numbers of older short-range nuclear weapons

a cut that would coincide with the scheduled arrival in Europe of new U.S. medium-range missiles at the end of the year.

The North Atlantic Assembly adopted a resolution calling on the NATO governments to "support a unilateral reduction in the total number of short-range nuclear warheads deployed in Europe as a militarily prudent and politically sensible measure. The weapons referred to are nuclear artillery shells and mines.

Although the assembly has no binding authority, it generally reflects the views of members of the U.S. Congress and the parliaments of the other NATO countries who are committed to a strong Western

After the initial unilateral cuts, the resolution went on to say, NATO should seek deeper cuts in the short-range weapons through a mutual "build-down" with the Warsaw Pact. This reduction would be analogous to the cuts in older strategie nuclear weapons recently proposed by President Ron-

A decision about whether, what and how much to cut would have to be made by the governments of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization itself.

Such a move has the double attraction of helping defuse anti-nuclear sentiment in Western Europe at an opportune moment and simultaneously improving NATO's military position. It would achieve the latter aim by eliminating obsolete, cumbersome weapons and introducing newer ones that would enable NATO forces to fight a longer conventional war before re-

"It's an ambiguous move that Tass said Thursday that the North Atlantic Assembly's resolution was a gimmick with no practical effect, The Associated Press reported from Moscow. Tass said the proposal did not call for any public or international verification, a complaint typically used by the United States about Soviet disarmament proposals.)

Specific recommendations about reducing NATO's European stock-pile of so-called battlefield nuclear weapons — nearly 6,000 warheads on tactical fighter-bombers, antiaircraft missiles, artillery and land mines — are being formulated by a NATO committee known as the High Level Group. The group is headed by Richard N. Perle, the U.S. assistant secretary of defense for international security policy.

Press reports have speculated that NATO might eliminate as many as 2,000 of its older warheads in an initial gesture that might be followed by deeper cuts if the Warsaw Pact reciprocated.

The High Level Group will submit proposals to the NATO defense ministers for a decision at a meeting Oct. 28 in Ottawa. Members of the group are expected to recommend the removal of more than 1,000 older warheads, several parliamentarians said after being briefed at The Hague by Mr. Perle

Politically, NATO governments could expect the move to reassure public opinion about the alliance's nuclear plans at a time when 108 Pershing-2 and 464 cruise missiles are to be deployed. The deployment will begin in December unless there is a breakthrough in the Geneva arms talks on intermediate-range nuclear forces. Militarily, a NATO offer to the Warsaw Pact of a mutual reduction would facilitate Western military policy in the years ahead regardless of whether the Geneva talks on intermediate-range weapons succeed. The Soviet Union, anticipating the arrival of new NATO missiles, has threatened to deploy new,

Officials said the Sikhs asked the 20 passengers their religion, lined up seven Hindu men by the side of the bus and opened fire. While the strategy of the rebels appears potentially effective, they still must prove that they can carry it out. A series of highly publicized air raids caused no significant damage. One of the targets was the strategic bridge at Nicaragua's principal port of Corinto.

Commando raids have been more effective. Frogmen blew up mooring facilities at one end of the pipeline at Puerto Sandino, temporarily preventing tankers from unloading there. BERLIN -- In Wittenberg two Sundays ago about 10,000 Christians poured into the town square for a mass rally marking the end of the synod of the Protestant Church of East Germany. After 37 years of concentrated atheist education by the state, the turnout, especially of young people, was "remarkable," one of the bishops remarked.

This year, the 500th anniversary of Luther's birth has been celebrated all over East Germany by both the Communist state and the church — both separately and together, each with its own interests in mind.

In East Germany, as in Poland and the other Communist countries of Eastern Europe, the relationship between church and state is part confrontation, part accommodation. Both recognize that they are in fundamental conflict but condemned to live next to each other if not together.

The Protestant Church of East Germany has eight million members out of a population of about 17 million, according to official figures. In addition, there are just over a million Roman Catholics, most of them in the south of the country.

The church has used the occasion to give the silent, epressed majority of Christians an occasion to come out into the open to show themselves and be active. Mass rallies like the one in Wittenberg have been held in several cities, and a final celebation of three days is scheduled to begin Nov. 10, the reformer's birthday, in Leipzig and the town of Eisleben, his birthplace.

A joint state-church commission was formed at the suggestion of the government to plan and coordinate some of the activities of the year. Erich Honecker, the party chief, personally represented the state on the commission and met with the bishops. By contrast, in 1967, on the 450th anniversary of the start of the Reformation, the state ignored the church.

Mr. Honecker is credited by churchmen with being more "realistic" toward the church than Walter Ulbricht, his predecessor. But Mr. Honecker's relatively open policy toward the church is known to be contested within the party leadership, and the future therefore is uncertain.

But there has been a marked change in the way Luther is being presented by state propaganda and in tization of the Luther anniversary as part of a wider effort to give the East German state a more solid foundation in German history.

In this view, the East German leaders "know that their state was not created by the working class; they have the problem of the Wall, the only way they can keep their people at home; they believe that their state can survive only as a German state and so they are trying to show that they are the heirs of German history just as much as the West Germans or more so."

Church members say it is too early to predict whether the celebrations and mass rallies of the Year of Luther will result in a lasting improvement of the position of the Protestant Church in East Germany. They say that atheist education continues in schools and newspapers, that religious activities are largely ignored by the media, but that the church has won the modest right to an independent radio broadcast of its own - once every two months.

At the synod in Wittenberg, the Protestant bishops urged the state to grant citizens more personal rights, including the the possibility to travel abroad. One of the church leaders appealed to Christians to stay in East Germany in spate of state harassment.

The church, though far from rebellious, has won a role in society largely by stressing its attachment to peace, opening its doors to young anti-militarists and generally offering young people cultural and spiritual outlets that they would not have otherwise.

ROME - Walid Jumblat, the leader of the Lebanese Druze, urged a ban Thursday on military sales to the Lebanese Army, complaining that his people were victims of a new Crusade.

Why does all the world want to protect the regime of Amin Gemayel and his army?" Mr. Jumblat asked at a news conference, referring to Lebanon's president.

The role of the multinational peacekeeping force must be rede-fined "after the attack by Americans on the Druze," Mr. Jumblat said. He said the Druze Moslems were only a small portion of the Lebanese population and asked: 'Is this a new Crusade against us, against Lebanese Islam? Far from protecting the whole Lebanese population as originally intended, the force has changed its role to one of defending the Gemayel government and its army, Mr. Jumblat said.

"Before a national solution between the parties in Lebanon, it is important not to give arms to the Lebanese Army, because these arms are going to be used against us as socialists, nationalists and patriots," he replied.

Mr. Jumblat, who has criticized the U.S. and French contingents in Lebanon, alleging that they had sided with Mr. Gemayel, said the 2,000-member Italian contingent had remained neutral.

Both the U.S. and French contingents fired back at Syrian-backed positions last month after their troops had come under fire, and U.S. units reportedly gave the Lebanese government forces some supporting fire.

Mr. Jumblat said that a political solution for Lebanon must scrap the current allocation of government posts, under which the leading state positions are distributed among the various ethnic groups according to a strict formula, or take into account the changes in the population since the arrangement

INTERNATIONAL HERALD TRIBUNE, FRIDAY, OCTOBER 7, 1983

By Steven R. Weisman

New York Times Service

WASHINGTON --- With some alarm, Senator Howard H. Baker Jr. of Tennessee cornered Senator Paul Laxalt of Nevada the other day to share the latest freshet of Republican gossip coursing shortly after, they expect Mr. Reagan to sign a through the Capitol.

Improbable as it seemed, Mr. Baker said, he had just heard that President Ronald Reagan was not really decided, and the committee is labeled "exgoing to run for re-election after all. Even more amazing, rumor had it that, after withdrawing, Mr. Reagan would anoint Vice President George Bush

Since Mr. Baker himself wants to succeed Mr. Reagan, he clearly needed reassurance from the man stated to oversee the president's re-election drive. Looking straight at his colleague, Mr. Laxelt replied, "If that's the case, Howard, they haven't told me."

White House officials expect a Reagan-Bush committee to be formed Oct. 17. On that day, or statement of candidacy.

Even if Mr. Reagan also asserts that he has not ploratory," most politicians are expected to view its formation as the definitive sign.

But as Oct. 17 approaches, the mystery has taken on new urgency. Republicans and Demo-crats have been gripped and fascinated by the possibility, however slim, that Mr. Reagan might not run. Not a few predict flatly that be will not. "Everyone's got the jitters," said a Republican strategist. "You get close to the time where it's a ment Ever since Mr. Reagan returned here from California over Labor Day weekend, it has been like are, you're waiting nervously."

At the White House, presidential advisers have been trying for months to persuade skeptics that Mr. Reagan is running.

And, indeed, the president's political-style appearances with key constituent groups, combined with his political jabs at Democrats, suggest to many that the campaign has begun.

Yet whenever they are asked, both Mr. Laxalt and James A. Baker 3d, the White House chief of staff, acknowledge that they have not yet got the word from Mr. Reagan himself.

On the one hand, White House aides argue that by refusing to make his plans explicit, the president is simply breathing drama into what otherwise would have been a predictable announce-generally effective president.

"We know that this president loves to follow a script," said a White House official.

"In theory, he may well decide that the best script would have him riding west into the sunset in 1984, basking in the glow of a reputation as the first successful president in two decades."

Reagan advisers know also that his decision will ultimately turn oo unpredictable factors, including the wishes of his wife, Nancy.

That seems to be why rumors that Mrs. Reagan was sick took on such force last week after it was reported that she had lost 10 pounds (four kilograms) in a year, and had become sick enough with a cold to cancel several appearances.

On the other, some people suspect that Mr. Reagan's sure sense of timing will tell him to retire Reagan and then reassured colleagues that, just as at a time when history may well judge him a the White House was insisting, her health was excellent overall.

A senior White House official, who has long professed certainty that Mr. Reagan will seek reelection, acknowledged recently that the president's behavior in Santa Barbara last August sent a ripple of doubt through the president's own staff.

Even after two U.S. marines were killed in Beirut, and after a South Korean airliner was shot down by the Soviet Union, Mr. Reagan's first instinct was to complete his vacation at his ranch. Only after being urged by his political advisers did he decide to cut short his holiday and return to Washington to deal with the crises.

Not for the first time, Mr. Reagan struck many as a president who does not especially relish the

Decision May Depend On Moves by Senate

By David Hoffman and Helen Dewar Washington Post Service

WASHINGTON - Interior Secretary James G. Watt, who has left Washington for a vacation in California, would resign rather than face Senate repudiation, ac-cording to administration officials. One informed official said Wednesday that Mr. Watt, faced with rising opposition in the Republican-controlled Senate over his remarks two weeks ago about an advisory panel, had come to realize that he could not remain in office for a few more months, as had been considered likely by White House officials last week. Instead, it is understood that Mr. Watt's timetable for a possible departure hinges on Senate action on resolution urging his removal. That action could come within a few weeks. Senate Republicans warned Wednesday in blunt, harshly critical terms that he would face repudiation in that chamber later this month unless he resigns.

The bleak assessment of Mr. Watt's standing in the Senate, confirmed by his strongest supporter there, Ted Stevens of Alaska, the assistant majority leader, was made as President Ronald Reagan defended the embattled secretary and said he should not be forced out because of a "stupid remark."

The White House said Thursday it would welcome an expression of Senate sentiment on Mr. Watt's future but would not feel bound by it, The Associated Press reported,]

Mr. Watt has been in trouble ion could become dangerous, in the with Senate Republicans and others since he referred two weeks ago to members of an advisory commission on coal leasing as "a black ... a woman, two Jews and a cripple."

White House efforts to portray the matter as closed served only to intensify Republican anxiety in Congress over the damage that the lost son —and the designer apparlawmakers believe it is doing to Mr. Reagan and the party, according to several Republican senators and congressional aides. Mr. Watt's support has faded even beyond what it was a few days ago, they said, and an overwhelming majority of Republican lawmakers now at him to quit. While Republicans have balked so far at a Democratic-sponsored call for Mr. Watt's resignation, they said they could not be counted on to block a no-confidence resolution if the secretary has not resigned before Congress returns Oct. 17 from its Columbus Day

Senator Slade Gorton, Republican of Washington, put it this way in a Senate speech Wednesday: Because of the character and personality of James Watt, and his management of the Department of the Interior, he is a failure on his own terms, a destructively divisive force in American society, an alba-tross around the neck of his own dent and administration, and an individual boorishly insensitive to the most modest standards of personal discourse required by the American people of those in posi-tions of substantial public trust."

TAIPEI - A Chinese Air Force pilot was killed when his plane crashed as he tried to defect to Taiwan last May from the southern province of Fujian, the Central News Agency revealed today.

The semi-official agency quoted military intelligence reports as saying Ho Kuoli took off in a MiG-19 from an air base on May 27 in an attempt to defect to Taiwan, a short distance away. He was intercepted by two other MiG-19s, which tried to force him to land, but his plane crashed during the chase, the agency said. It did not give his age or rank.

A Nobel, and Hope

The Nobel committee's selection of Lech Walesa for its 1983 peace prize is one of its best. It confers a useful extra ration of prestige and international visibility and, hence, personal protection on a figure who still represents Poland's best hope for a peaceful and productive resolution of its profound tensions.

The committee specifically cited Mr. Walesa's nonviolent methods. By no other means could the founder of the Solidarity trade union have accomplished what he did in organizing a mass movement and in offering his country an alternative to domination by an armed, foreign-supported minority. It was not Lech Walesa and the Polish workers but the Polish authorities, acting under the pressure of Moscow, who cut short his experiment in democratic socialism and brought force to bear.

The Polish government seeks cow, still, to deny Mr. Walesa a place in the organized public life of his country. It wants the Polish people to write him out of their plans for their foture. But short of the complete Sovietization of Poland - a step from which, wisely, the regime hangs back - there is no way the government can deny him a place in the very active realm of the unorganized public life of Poland. He retains enormous courage, energy and tactical skill, a popular following far superior to any that the regime's leadership can command and, thanks in part to the first two, media access and a measure of personal invio-lability that the award should augment. Warsaw finds the choice of Mr. Walesa an abuse of the Nobel award. But such prizes are not given to comfort governments that cannot solve problems substantially of their own making. The Polish authorities might recall that a year ago the Nobel people honored two disarmament figures, a Swede and a Mexican, whose principal contribution to the American government had been a case of heartburn. The Nobel committee does take a broad view of what sort of activity constitutes "peace," but its choices have stood up pretty well over time.

The committee intends not only to hail past achievements of its honocees but also to enable them to continue their work. No one can doubt this is what Mr. Walesa intends to do.

Crippled Argentina

Argentina is stumbling toward an election on Oct. 30 to choose a civilian president who is supposed to take office in January. But don't count on it happening. Argentina is so broke, wounded and bewildered that no one can be certain the voting will take place, that its outcome will be honored or that the resulting vernment will be able to exercise real authority. And if Argentina plunges into bankruptcy and chaos, Central America's miseries may seem paltry by comparison.

Seven years of military rule have yielded a lost war in the Falklands, a tottering economy and the bitter memory of perhaps 7,000 deaths and disappearances during the "dirty war" against terrorism. By the government's own reckoning, real wages have dropped by as much as 60 percent since 1975, while inflation, now raging at 571 percent, has spawned strikes and demagogic attacks on bankers.

There is no painless remedy for a crisis caused by poor government, a global recession and $40 billion in foreign debts. Nor does the logic of Argentine politics encourage optimism. It asks a lot of the Peronist contender, Italo Luder, to impose austerity on his labor backers, His main rival, Raul Alfonsin of the middle-class Radicals, has the reverse problem: He would deal from weakness against Peronist-led unions clamoring for more.

Worse, the junta has compounded its economic misrule with a misnamed Law of National Pacification, which is meant to close the books on the "dirty war," The law absolves the armed forces of responsibility for crimes against humanity during the anti-terrorist campaign of the 1970s. It is a self-amnesty, contrived to prevent court review by a future civilian government, and is rejected as immoral and illegal by the two leading candidates. Just as the repression began to feed on itself, so now does the outrage of its victims. "Without justice and punishment," says the leader of the Mothers of the Plaza de Mayo, "peace will not be possible." But if a future government annuls the amnesty, it risks an explosive confrontation with a military establishment determined to protect its own.

To appear evenhanded, the outgoing jonta extended amnesty also to some leftist terrorists, and to former President Isabel Perón That is the kind of trickery that discredited the Argentine military. Mrs. Peron is revered as a symbol by the loyalist core of the move-ment her husband founded. But she is regarded with horror by the middle classes, who welcomed her overthrow by the armed forces in 1976. Permitting her to return from exile

m Spain is a piece of mischief.

And now, in the old Peronist mode, politicians compete in attacking foreign banks and accusing economic planners of treason. The leading candidates have stopped short — but only just — of threatening default of Argentina's debts. Demonology must be on the loose when the head of the central bank is arrested for violating "sovereignty" by repaying an airline debt. Argentina has a case for less operous terms on its loans. But its solvency and democratic renewal require a maturity that, sadly, is still not in evidence.

The Choice of Walesa

(The awarding of the Nobel Peace Prize to Lech Walesa] should not be celebrated merely for its propaganda value and the discomfort it and important point. The danger to peace in Europe derives not just from the confrontation of the superpowers and the accumulation of nuclear weapons, but from the impositions on Eastern Europe of systems of government which are alien and unacceptable to the people who live under them.

Since this situation cannot be directly challenged by military force in the nuclear age, it can probably be changed only by evolution, unless uncontrolled disintegration sets in first. Therefore the cause of peace is furthered by those such as Mr. Walesa who work responsibly and peacefully for representative institutions and human rights in Eastern Europe.

If the [Polish] regime knew how to seize this moment, it might have a chance of escaping from the present impasse. It needs Mr. Walesa. One day it may discover this, as it belatedly found it needed the late Cardinal Wyszynski, after persecuting him for years. It needs Mr. Walesa because it needs someone who can negotiate on behalf of the people.

Mr. Walesa could step in if given the chance. The moment is relatively propitious. Solidarity is rethinking its role and its tactics. It is realistically not expecting a full restoration. It is merely trying to demonstrate that the regime cannot rule by terror alone.

- The Times (London).

The prize means not so much burying Walesa under money and honors as establishing him as a third pillar next to [Archbishop Jozef] Glemp and [General Wojciech] Jaruzelski.

Now is the time for the Polish government to show its generosity - and to take into considcration that without Walesa there can be no accord between the workers and the government in the foresceable future.

- Tages Anzeiger (Zurich).

Lech Walesa cannot escape all responsibility for the fact that the experimental reforms begun with such hope were destroyed by an unrealistic radicalism.

- Berner Zeitung (Bern). Uotil peace comes into being, the Nobel committee in Oslo might do better to raise money for a different prize. Not that anyone should take exception to this year's recipient on general grounds: the common man and hero of his people who has rattled a foreignimposed regime without shedding a drop of blood. But Mr. Nobel's prize was for the persoo making the most outstanding contribution to peace, by which he meant peace between nations. Mr. Walesa has been toiling in quite a different shipyard. The only recipients in recent years who have put an end to hostilities, have not been universally admired for other things they have done. They are Menachem Begin, Anwar Sadat, Henry Kissinger and Le Duc Tho. The Nobel committee may well feel that unless it makes a political gesture now and then its purpose will become anodyne. In that case the more valuable political gesture oow would be to withhold the prize altogether.

If the committee wants to give prizes for humanitarian endeavor or social advancement or the struggle for liberation it will have to ask the courts to look at Mr. Nobel's will. Peace was the word he used.

U.S. Should Not Oversee Lebanon's Unraveling

By Joseph Kraft

WASHINGTON — The latest cease-fire in Lebanon accurately reflects the relative strengths of forces on the ground. But it leads inevitably to a weakening of the government under Amin Gemayel. There is oo oeed for President Reagan's personal emissary, Robert McFarlane, to preside over the unraveling. On the contrary, the need is to drive for an early withdrawal of the American marines. Israel and Syria have supplied the main forces in Lebauon since June of last year. The Israeli invasion, and the advance to Beirut, dealt power to the Maronite Christians who formed a government under President Gemayel. With the Israelis holding everybody else at bay, the United States, France and Italy could make available a token multinational force to cover a projected withdrawal of all foreign armies from Lebanon.

All that was changed by an event whose watershed character seems not yet to have been grasped. The redeployment of Israeli forces inside Lebanon constituted a kind of historic flinch. For the first time, the Israelis, on their own motion as distinct from under U.S. pressure, gave up territory they had seized from the Arabs.

The redeployment, accordingly, not only weakened Mr. Gemayel and the Maronite Christians, it also devalued the best U.S. card for dealing with the Arabs: the capacity to make Israel withdraw. So the initiative passed to the one Arab leader who had long dispensed with U.S. friendship on the theory that the Israelis were bound to crack on their own - Hafez al-Assad.

Syria has deep designs on Lebanon, which it does oot recognize as an independent state, President Assad has been tenacious in asserting these designs. He began putting troops into Lebanon in 1975; there are now about 40,000 soldiers in the Bekaa Vailey and in the oorthern jet planes in the Israeli invasion, Mr. Assad kept his forces in Lebaoon. He re-equipped them with So-viet weapons. He evaded the American diplomatic efforts, which were backed by Saudi money, to coordinate evacuation of Synan troops with evacuation of the Israeli forces. When the Gemayel government was formed, and especially as it edged toward a security agreement with Israel, Mr. Assad forged close ties with dissident Lebanese factions, notably the Shiite Moslems, south of Beirut, and the Druze Moslems, in the Chuf mountains east of the capital. Working through them, Mr. Assad mounted pressure on Mr. Gemayel, the Israelis and the United States. The pressure was redoubled when ployment last month. First the Druze militia and then the Shiite militia took on Lebanese government forces. American, French and Italian troops were caught in the crossive and suffered casualties. In those conditions, Mr. Assad negotiated the present cease-fire with Mr. McFarlane and the Sandi ambassador to the United States, Prince Bandar bin-Sultan. The terms of the cease-fire accord are perilous to the U.S. marines and humiliating to Mr. Gemayel. The agreement does not stipulate an outside force to supervise the ceasefire. Mr. Assad has refused a U.S. proposal for a United Nations observer team. So the fighting can resume any time, with the marines in exposed positions.

Theoretically, a political compro-mise is to be worked out by a National Reconciliation Commission. But Mr. Gemayel commands a majority of three within the 10-member commission, so there is bound to be more pulling and hanling. Even if an accord is reached, it will be on the basis of concessions from Mr. Gemayel

For an American presidential art of the country.

Despite the loss of more than 100 such hugger-mugger is at best un-

dignified. Mr. McFarlane should not become an active party to the negotiations again. While the ma-tines are stuck for the moment, every effort should be made to provide a framework for cease-fire observers. A promising possibility, which Mr. McFarlane explored last weekend in Rome with President Reagan's national security adviser, William Clark, and Defense Secretary Caspar Weinberger, points to-ward a force drawn from European countries. That would let the matines out.

The central fact is that very little can now be won in Lebanon. Even a reconciliation among warring clans can only apply to the area around Beirut. The Saudis, and some State lieve they can cut a deal with Mr. Assad, But that approach overlooks his tenacious drive for Lebanon and the failure of the previous withdrawal negotiations.

No doubt American prestige will drop when the marines leave. The scheme of the Reagan administration for building a general peace in the Middle East on a settlement in Lebanon will be shown up as nearmyth. But with the marines out, the United States will recover the freedom of action appropriate to a su-perpower. As for Mr. Assad, if he keeps it up, he will rum into the Israelis. And they will give him what is now a prerequisite of balance in the Middle East: another bloody nose.

Superpower Metaphor: Blind Misreading the Blind

WASHINGTON — Henry Kissinger once ob-served that "the superpowers of ien behaved like two heavily armed blind men feeling their way around the room, each believing himself in mortal peril from the other, whom he assumes to have perfect vision. Each tends to ascribe to the other a consistency, foresight and coherence that its own experience belies." Now that is a description of a pretty hairy state of affairs.

As Mr. Kissinger noted, "Over time, even two blind men can do enormous damage to each other, not to speak of the room." And it is also, alas, nearly a perfect metaphor for the way the superpowers responded to the shooting down of the Korean arriner. More importantly, it works for the way they were already behaving on the wider range of competition and contention over nuclear weapons buildup, arms control and the struggle for influence in the Third World.

That is the point too often missed in the uproar over the Korean airliner tragedy: Even before it happened, a good number of authorities on the Soviet Union had concluded that U.S.-Soviet relations had deteriorated dangerously and were likely to remain distant and unproductive, perhaps for the duration of the Reagan presidency.

Witness an article in the fall issue of Foreign Policy ("Reagan Through Soviet Eyes") by two recognized Kremlinologists, Lawrence T. Cald-well, professor of political science at Occidental College, and Robert Legvold, director of the Soviet project of the New York Council on Foreign Relations. What makes it of special interest is that the message was overtaken by the sirliner tragedy and the resultant U.S.-Soviet crisis.

Mr. Caldwell and Mr. Legvold were already saying that the Russians, squinting narrowly at Germans have looked much more favorably on the United States than on the Soviet Union. The Russians, for example, could oot match the U.S.

CARE packages and Marshall Plan. The West German population accepted the Americanization of political and cultural life with more gratitude than distaste, while Soviet influence in East Germany remained foreign and superficial. After the war, most West Germans tried to forget the recent past — to forget that it was because of Hitler that the Russians first came into Germany -and to claim credit for the democracy ica's most devoted and loyal allies. As recently as a year ago, polls showed that 75 percent of the population still felt a need for U.S. protection.

Nonetheless, in the late 1950s there was a wave of resistance to the idea of nuclear defense. A few years ago, a second wave of revulsion was generated by proposals for a neutron bomb. But it took the 1979 Christmas present — the conditional agreement

Ronald Reagan's rhetoric, were missing the evidence of Mr. Reagan's relative restraint. Soviet leaders, they argued, do not see that "Reagan's bark has been much worse than his bite; that his language may be tough but his actions are mild, Similarly, the Reagan administration is the captive of its own ideological myopia. It is not easy for the Reagan White House to see beyond its "focus of all evil" fixation with the Russians. Thus, U.S. and Soviet reactions to the fate of the Korean airliner are significant more for what they say about U.S.-Soviet relations than for contributing to those relations.

Witness the inability of the Soviet air-defense command to see how a commercial jetliner, with today's high-tech navigational aids, could wander aimlessly so far off course, and over Soviet territory known to be extraordinarily sensitive. That would not be an act of "coherence" or of the "foresight" that the Soviet leaders ascribe to the United States. There is no room in the Soviet thought process for a blunder.

Similarly, the Reagan White House could not see any combination of standing instructions to Soviet air-defense commanders, of pure incompetence, or of territorial paranoia that could account for the killing of 269 innocent travelers. It had to be premeditated murder; nothing else was consis-tent with the White House sense of Soviet consistency. "One of the real tragedies of the KAL atrocity," said William Clark, the national security adviser, "is that it is not, as some suggest, an unexplainable departure from Soviet attitude."

As with the Korean plane, so it is with the world. The same White House sense of a coherent Soviet. "attitude" informs the Reagan view that the Soviet Union, as the president once put it, "underlies all the rest that is going on - if they weren't engaged in this game of dominoes, there wouldn't be any hot spots in the world." The qualifier with Mr. Reagan lies in certain checks and balances to ideological fervor. He has people around to remind him of the home-grown forces at work in those "hot spots." He has even indicated his own awareness of the ressure-cooker effects of poverty and social injustice and indigenous nationalist impulses. So one can discount the Reagan risetoric, even as U.S. grain and pipeline laying equipment is being cleared for shipment to the Soviet Union. But is it possible for the powers in Moscow to discount the Reagan rhetoric? Or does it not play into the hands of those who would like to believe that, as Yuri Andropov says, they are confronted by an unreconstructably "militarist" Reagan ad-ministration that is embarked on a worldwide crusade against socialism?

Here we come back to the Kissinger metaphor of the blind reading, or misreading, the blind. We can be no more sure what Y mi Andropov means when he speaks of the United States as "contenders to the role of rulers of the destinies of the world" than the Soviet leaders can be certain what Ronald Reagan means when he says that the Russians know only how to lie, cheat and steal.

This is not a state of affairs that leads logically to risk-taking by either side. Neither does it lead to efforts to deal with matters of mumal self-interest. starting with arms control.

From the Greens, Backhanded Gratitude to Reagan

By Rudolf Bahro

N PW YORK — The arms control proposals that President Reagan made recently at the United Nations be protected but rejects this means of rean airliner incident typical of Sovido nothing to change the fundamen-tal threat that will be posed to Europe and the Western alliance if intermediate-range nuclear missiles are de-ployed in West Germany this winter. As a member of the West German peace movement, I find it ironic that the president does not see what he is doing to alienate even those West Germans — and they are the vast majority — who want to keep special ties with the United States.

Since World War II, most West would serve to attract a Soviet missile strike. Why? Because it seems to us that in a crisis, the Kremlin would feel it had to strike first to knock out NATO missiles that can hit Soviet targets in only five to eight minutes. West Germans have oot changed their attitude toward the Russians. But even — and especially — those West Germans who consider the Ko-

"protection" — rejects weapons that et conduct have reason to to be wor-we in the peace movement believe ried. After all, the new missiles to be ried. After all, the new missiles to be decloyed in Europe would clearly be more dangerous for the Soviet Union than any passenger plane.

The leaders of the Atlantic alliance should understand that deploying intermediate-range missiles in Europe runs directly counter to their interests. Why? Because it makes clear that the logical consequence of the "flexible response" strategy, in force since the early 1960s, is to turn Europe into a nuclear battleground and thus corrodes NATO's foundations. We Europeans should be grateful to Rousld Reagan for so completely unmasking our role as pawns on the international chessboard pawns to be sacrificed as needed.

And in Hesse, a Trying Lesson in Power

MUNICH — For most people, politics is the art of the possible. But for West Germany's Greens, the party of ecologists, peace advo-cates and civil rights activists, it has been the opposite. Now, realities are catching up with them.

The Greens squeaked back into the Hesse state legislature in the recent elections, and found themselves facing a decision on what to do with the pivotal power they held there.

In a bitter post-election conven-tion, the Hessian Greens voted to offer their "continual cooperation" to Hesse's incumbent premier, Holger Börner, whose Social Democrats won a decisive plurality but fell five seats short of a ruling majority.

The Greens decided to back Mr. Borner and to support — or at least not oppose — some of his legislation, but not to enter his cabinet. The offer is a step short of a coalition. For the maverick Greens, it is a giant step.

The Greens, with their long hair, flower-child style of dress and irreverent attitudes, are highly visible. They place potted plants on their desks and drag in trees killed by acid rain; one party member even splattered blood on a U.S. general. These actions have aroused indig- jects, economic growth and the still nation among members of the more controversial runway under construcestablished parties, though some say guardedly that the Greens' predictable outrageousness has brought a breath of fresh air to the staid parliamentary surroundings.

What was less widely expected was the way politics would change the Greens. Hesse provided the first sign. The state convention was a sometimes acrimonious confrontation between two factions that have emerged within the Green party at the local, state and federal level: the "realists" and the "fundamentalists."

The "realists" plead for compromise on principles and argue that, without it, the party will remain forever impotent, a protest sect on the fringe of society.

The "fundamentalists" contend that any compromise or collabora-tion with establishment parties contradicts the Greens' raison d'etre and is tantamount to reneging on the mandate from their voters.

ergy, industrial development pro-

In Hesse, the arguments centered on tangible local issues such as Mr. Borner's commitment to nuclear ention at Frankfurt airport. But the same sort of arguments divide the Greens at the national level.

It helps to recall that the Green party is a multicolored animal. It is a protest movement that deals with several issues, including missile de-ployment, the environment, and limitations on individual freedoms.

At the same time it reflects a deep feeling of political alienation and disaffection in West Germany, especially among the young, who believe that parliaments do not truly represent the public the public. It is to these West Germans that the Orcens have appealed successfully with promises to rotate their depu-ties at midterm, to adhere to principles and to make the legislative process "more transparent."

Those promises, however, can be kept only as long as the Greens do not hold the balance of power in the legislatures to which they have been elected. As long as they are essentially powerless, they can remain fundamentally pure and play the opposi-tion role. They are spared the burden of sharing the responsibility of gov-

Warning From a Sandinist

By Tom Wicker

Not military activity by the socalled contras operating out of Hon-duras against the Sandmist regime in Nicaragua was caused by orders from the Central Intelligence Agency to "do or die," The Washington Post has reported. Since earlier efforts by the contra sperillas had been mostly ineffective, the report said, the CIA told the gnerrillas' parent group, the Nicara-guan Democratic Force, to show re-sults by the end of September or face a funding cut-off by Congress.

That lends point to recent remarks to a small New York audience by the Rev. Miguel d'Escoto Brockmann, the Maryknoll priest who is foreign minister in the Sandinist government. Pointing ont that the U.S. Congress was debating whether "to devote mil-lions of dollars to the destabilization of another country," Mr. d'Escoto asked in tones of disbelief: "Is this a government of laws?"

That is a good question that cannot quite be answered by U.S. accusations that Nicaragua itself is trying to destabilize El Salvador by sending arms to rebels there.

The Reagan administration has produced no proof of this, and U.S. sources in Central America concede that the supposed flow of supplies is down to a trickle of mostly nonlethal materiel. More important, trying to overthrow a recognized government with CIA funds and a hired army—
"covert operations" is the euphomism—violates U.S. law, the charter of the Organization of American States, and the very principles the administration professes to uphold in Central America.

The Democratic-controlled House. on just such grounds, already has voted to cut off funds for the contras; the Republican-dominated Senate soon will debate the matter, with the Reagan administration likely to persuade a majority to continue support of the guerrillas. Why is the administration so determined to oust the Sandinists or to prevent consolidation" of their government, as a recent official state-ment put it? The Nicaraguan foreign minister offered what might be called the view from Managna: Washington is not really motivated, he suggested, by either of its expressed concerns — that the Sandinists are shipping arms to Salvadoran guerrillas, and that as a Marrist govemment they will "export their revolution" to other countries.

Nicatagna does not have the power to do so, Mr. d'Escoto said; besides, he insisted, a revolution cannot be exported "like coffee or cotton."

But "a good example spreads," he noted; and he went on to say that what the Reagan administration real-ly fears is that Nicaragua, having overthrown a U.S.-supported dicta-tor, will now be able "against great odds" to meet the aspirations of its people. That, he said, would cause other nations in Latin America to "look on with hope" and would show them "that you can free yourself." Thus, in his view, the Reagan administration had "come to the con-clusion that Nicaragua mustn't be allowed to get away with its revolution." Its aim is "to teach a lesson to other countries: Don't try it." This view obviously is to some extent self-serving; but it is nevertheless ealightening for norteamericanos to have such a glimpse of how things look from the other side. And in light of The Post's report on the CIA's impatience with the contras, attention should be paid to Mr. d'Escoto's warning as to where administration policy may lead. "It has to be clear" to officials in Washington, he said, that the contrawar "doesn't get them anywhere." So they will increase the pressure, he predicted, first using the army and air force of Honduras, then, inevitably," U.S. troops.

But even if Washington sent "500,000, as in Vietnam," the foreign minister said, they would not succced, because the resulting struggle would be a guerrilla war in which "every Nicaraguan, including my 84-year-old mother, will fight."

Such a war, he suggested, would embroil the United States for years and destroy respect for it in Latin America and elsewhere in the Third World. And every U.S. citizen, he said, "not for love of Nicaragua but for love of your own country should be interested in helping the United States not to make a mistake that would be a source of embarrassment and shame for years to come."

Considering the source, some Americans will not like that advice. But all would do well to ponder it. The New York Times.

Tchaikovsky, Unvarnished

by Donal Henahan

EW YORK — Biographies of fam-ous people of our time — the living or the recently alive — are certainly not useless. Rather often, in music at any rate, they can he wonderfully entertain-ing, like dipping into the Apocrypha.

I particularly enjoy the life stories of opera singers and other virtuosos whom I have known, however slightly. These books, which flood out each season, usually make little pre-tense to objectivity or documentary truth but simply reflect the subject's idealized image of bimself or herself. The writers go along, either out of genuine hero worship or out of the fear of being denied access to invaluable historical documents such as old programs and landatory

And really, it makes little sense to expect more of these hard-pressed authors than that. Contemporary biography, no matter who practices it, is a hybrid art: part history, part liction. It is mythology in action.

I was sharply reminded of the contemporar biographer's difficulties while reading another sort of book entirely, David Brown's Tchaikovsky: The Crisis Years, 1874-1878," the second of three volumes published by Norton. The project already shapes up as the first clear-eyed, thoroughly candid account of the Russian composer's fruitful though tortured life.

Millions of words on the subject have been spilled previously, of course, but most of them have been obfuscatory nonsense. However, it is probable that no reliable account could have been written until now, 90 years after Tchaikovsky's death, because too many obstacles stood in the way. Chief among them were his homosexuality and apparent suicide, both of which his family and friends worked mightily and successfully for many years to bury from

Brown has been able to cut through the varnish applied so heavily by these well-intentioned protectors of the composer's name, partly because he has had access to some longlost Tchaikovsky letters that an emigré musicologist, Alexandra Orlova, smuggled out of the Soviet Union in 1979.

These intimate letters, written to his brothers Modest and Anatoly and other family members, were finally printed by the Russians in 1940, but probably out of national pride were suppressed before publication. Orlova came across them while working in the Tchaikovsky Museum in Klin.

The documents dispense once and forever with the notion, which still can he found in rogram notes and on record jackets, that Tchaikovsky was a chaste esthete whose chief extracurricular interest in life was a platonic relationship with his generous patron, Nadezhda von Meck. Von Meck was a married woman with whom he corresponded regularly about all sorts of musical and personal matters but whom he met only once in the street and never spoke to.

In fact, the Tchaikovsky who comes alive in these pages is anything but the freeze-dried saint of popular literature. He is a man continually fighting against a homosexual drive whose power frightened him, and continually losing the battle. Partly out of fear of disgracing his family, with whom he enjoyed an al-most claustrophobic closeness, be wanted nothing more than to lead a conventionally respectable life. He was not interested in coming out, as we would now say, but only in building himself a deeper and safer closet. Overt homosexuality in the Russia of his time was a crime against the state; secret homosex-

"If I am marrying without love," be writes to von Meck, "it is because circumstances conspired to make it impossible for me to do otherwise."

uality for a person of Tchaikovsky's promi-

So, unable to deal with his unsanctioned impulses, be rushed into marriage with a person he hardly knew. Soon he was writing to his brother Anatoly about his scorn for Antonina: "An intelligent woman might instill fear of herself in me. I stand so far above this one, I am so superior to her that at least I shall never be frightened of her." And again to Anatoly: "Physically my wife has become totally repugnant to me'

Tchaikovsky left his bride after nine days and, it seems, tried to reconcile himself to living a secret life, in constant dread of being found out. It is clear from his letters that what he feared most in life was being exposed and bringing down dishonor on his family and

This carefully documented account of a great artist continuing to work brilliantly while on the brink of personal disaster is a moving one in Brown's hands. During these years Tchaikovsky produced "Swan Lake," the First Piano Concerto, the Fourth Symphony and the Violin Concerto, often while working against what be termed the "implacable antipathy" of Anton Rubinstein, who was not only a rival composer but also one of the most powerful figures in Russian music.

His achievements would hardly have been possible if he had not been able to keep his artistic and personal lives in tightly scaled separate compartments. But there was a price to be paid eventually, a fatal one. Brown's third colume will have to deal with the sticky issue of Tchaikovsky's suicide, about which scholars are still conjecturing and arguing. Orlova has published research that suggests Tchaikovsky was forced to take poison on orders from a "court of bonor" composed of old classmates who were upset that word of his affair with a nephew of Duke Stenbock-Thurmor had come to the attention of the crar.

Brown, in his article on Tchaikovsky in the New Grove Dictionary of Music and Musicians, discusses the Orlova contention seriously and presumably will deal with it more fully in the final volume of his biography.

Brown's two volumes so far elevate the discussion of Tchaikovsky's music well beyond the usual chatter about his mournful Russian soul and his struggle against fate. He takes the works as seriously as they deserve to be taken in a time when Tchaikovsky's stock has risen quite a bit, perhaps partly because of the high value placed on the music by such latter-day saints of the avant-garde as Stravinsky.

This second installment in Tchaikovsky's life is rather dark and portentous in mood on the whole, but there are light touches. I especially relished the account of Tchaikovsky's visit to Paris in 1875 when he struck up an instant though ephemeral friendship with Saint-Saens. Both, it turned out, thought of themselves as fine dancers, so they staged an imprompts performance of an entire ballet, "Galatea and Pygmalion," on the stage of the Conservatoire. The 40-year-old composer of "The Carnival of Animals" portrayed Galatea and the 35-year-old author of "Swan-Lake" was the sculptor.

This story comes second-hand from Modest, so Brown feels compelled as a good scholar to note sadly that there seem to have been "no actual witnesses of this spectacle."

In this solemnly celebrated Wagner year, I was also amused to read what Tehaikovsky thought of the first "Ring" cycle at Bayreuth in August 1876, which he attended as a correspondent for the Russian Gazette. He was not the perfect Wagnerite or close to it, as his nmary article made clear:

"My recollection of Bayreuth remains oppressive. . Finally on Thursday it was all over, and with the last chords of Gotterdammerung' f felt as though I'd been released from captivity. Perhaps 'Nibelungen' is a very great work, but there's certainly never yet been anything more boring and prolix...Of course, there are some wonderful moments — but taken all in all, it's killingly boring! How many hundreds of thousands of times nicer is 'Syl-

Like many another musician of his time and since, Tchaikovsky believed that Wagner had led an entire art astray: "And so this is what Wagner's reform has achieved! At one time they tried to make music give people pleasure — now they torture and tire them." Down through the centuries a chasm has vawned between those who think music should aplift and those who think it should entertain. Say what you will about Tchaikovsky, there never is any doubt as to where he stands on that

And perhaps it is just this unwavering con-viction that we feel in all his music and that gives it a character as definite and unmistakable as that of Wagner. The universe of music is large enough to contain two such ideas and only a fool should feel forced to make a choice

West Berlin Chipping In for Art

by John Curtin

ERLIN — At 15 million Deutsche marks ($5.7 million) every-body agrees it's a bargain. And so the people of West Berlin as well as some of the city's major cultural institutions — are being asked to pay a third of the bill.

"Berliners Must Save Precious Watteau Painting," ran the front-page beadline of a German newspaper last week as a fund-raising drive began to help the Charlottenburg Palace Museum purchase Jean-Antoine Watteau's "L'Embarquement pour Cythère," a masterpiece of 18thcentury European art.

A $5.7-million bargain? The price, which few art works have surpassed at auction, is still far below what is regarded as the real market value of the Watteau work. The Jean Paul Getty Museum in Malibu. California, has already offered more than $12 million for the large Prince Louis Ferdinand von Prenssen owns the painting, but it has been on loan to the Charlottenburg Palace for the last 20 years. Now, needing a large sum of money to repair his castle, the prince has decided to sell the painting, which has been in the Hohenzollern family since Frederick the Great acquired it in 1763. A West German law restricting the export of masterpieces is responsible for the below-the-market price at which the prince is offering it to the Charlottenburg Palace Museum.

The museum is eager to keep the Watteau, but West Berlin's Senate and the West German government have agreed only to put up two-thirds of the sum, under the proviso that Berliners and "friends of Berlin" raise the remaining 5 million Deutsche marks.

So, with New Year's Eve as a deadline, the push is on to come up with the cash quickly. In addition to such standard fund-raising procedures as newspaper ads and private appeals to wealthy patrons of the arts, the city has called on some of its most prestigious cultural institutions.

They have responded with enthusiasm, scheduling a wide variety of activities whose proceeds will go toward the purchase of the painting. It's a case of art saving art, with events that run throughout October and

Last Sunday the Dentsche Oper gave a gala performance of Mozart's "The Marriage of Figaro" for the cause. On Friday and Saturday, the prestigious Schaubühne theater is putting on plays in the gardens of the Charlottenburg Palace by the 18th-century French playwright Mari-vaux. Herbert von Karajan will lead the Berlin Philharmonic in a special benefit concert on Nov. 20. The German baritone Dietrich Fischer-

Dieskan plans to give a lieder recital.

Thousands of copies of a "Watteau in Berlin" calendar — containing pictures of the 12 works by the artist in the city's museums - have been printed. Profits will go towards the purchase of "L'Embarquement." A small exhibition of 18th-century masterpieces, which opened last week in the Charlottenburg Palace with canvases lent by the Louvre, the Prado and the Staedelsche Kunstinstitut of Frankfurt, is designed to draw public attention to Wattern and his contemporaries. The French artist painted three canvases depicting the Island of Cythera, a mythical place of amorous encounter. The second version, which is in the Louvre, and the third, which Berlin is hoping to acquire, were painted in 1717. Both show a group of frivolous "pilgrims" on the shore of a woody coast.

The original title of the painting — changed soon after it was completed — was the ambiguous "Pelerinage a Cythère," which can be translated as pilgrimage either at or to Cythera. The interpretation of the preposition stimulated years of debate among art historians: Were the ilgrims setting out for the Island of Love or were they about to leave it? No one knew for sure, but the uncertainty - despite the second title - lends charm to the artist's fleeting world. Wherever Wattean's jovial courtiers are heading, art lovers here hope that the painting will stay where it is. "The picture," said West Berlin's Burgomester, Richard von Weizsäcker, "is closely connected to the culture and history of Berlin, and must stay in Berlin. Every mark is

Raymond Aron: The Line Forms, Again, on the Right

by Vicky Elliott

ARIS - André Mairaux told him in the 1940s not to worry, that age sorts everything out. Raymond Aron, sociologist, academic and political commentator, is 78 now and flourishing in the autumn of the patrianch. He has weathered criticism and praise, adulation and ostracism, and now finds himself back in fashion. But what be really trusts in, he insists, is his consistent capacity for doubt. "I belong to the race of people who asks questions," he says in an interview. "I'm a man of questions, of doubts and self-criticism. I haven't made a systematic treatment of my heliefs in a simple book —it's haven't made a systematic treatment of my beliefs in a single book —it's implicit in everything I have done."

This he describes as a fundamental conviction in the value of liberty and truth, which be declines to define further but which presumably includes his rigorous opposition to the Soviet system and the pro-Americanism that branded him as "Marshallized" after World War II, when the French intelligentsia looked East for inspiration.

The wheel has moved on. The publication of his "Mémoires" three weeks ago has wrapped him in what Aron says his detractors call a secular beatification. "I have always had an audience," Aron says, "but none of my books has ever had such a success." If France's lefust intellectuals have abdicated from public debate, the media have made up for it this fall by focusing on the career of the man they all insist on calling this "committed spectator," who has scanned more than 50 years of French politics from a point somewhere right of center. The deference is overwhelming, and it wouldn't be true to say Aron doesn't enjoy it, although he is a little weary.

He is still savoring the 3 reprintings in as many weeks, the 300,000 copies sold and the "81 percent" (his judicious estimate) of favorable reviews - including, be exults, that of the usually critical newspaper Le Monde. He had thought the memoirs would be boring; he had never written this kind of book before. "I was as terrified as if I had never published anything," he said this week, wearing his journalist's hat at his office at the magazine L'Express, his voice occasionally drowned out by the beligerent traffic around the Arc de Triomphe.

There were three books in his bead when he started in 1979: one, "The Marxism of Marx," a fleshing out of a lecture series; another closing the loop on a lecture given at the Collège de France on the historical condition of the sociologist, and then his memoirs. He wrote introductory chapters to each, "just to see what my meconscious wanted" and the life story won. He likes the irony of this, as a man of Reason chronically accused of icy objectivity.

He would prefer to explain the recent burst of interest by the fact that he is one of the survivors of a generation that included Sartre and Koestler: "We lived intensely through the upheavals of this century: the aftermath of World War I, the prewar period, the Cold War." He has said that he lost the faculty of happiness after the French defeat in World War II, the genocide of the Jews and the death of a daughter but, despite his weak heart, age sits on him well.

Fifty years ago the Paris-born Aron was there, a young teacher in Germany, looking on while Joseph Goebbels made a bonfire of proscribed books in front of the university in Berlin. When war came, Aron gave up his idea of driving a tank to write measured editorials in London for the Free French monthly France Libre, in the offices of General de

He worked in his friend Malraux's Ministry of Information right after the war, and joined the Gaullist party in 1947 for a few years. He thinks he signed up for the Socialist party in 1926; a footnote in the memoirs says that a friend thinks otherwise. These flirtations with active politics were uncharacteristic: Raymond Aron doesn't go about joining in. The memoirs contain almost no use of the first person phural, except, on rare occasions, to include his wife, Suzanne: neither in reference to the French, to his fellow Jews, to his journalistic or academic colleagues. "I'm not the chief of a school or a sect," Aron insists, "I have never wanted to be with anyone but Raymond Aron."

professor of Le Figaro," and Aron seems glad to qualify his curriculum vitae as "original."

"I put myself at the intersection of politics, philosophy and the social sciences," be says. It sometimes looks as though his oscillation between the active and the contemplative, between academe and the political arena, was a ploy to make sure he remained an outsider.

During the 1950s, after his attack on French Marxism in "The Opium of the Intellectuals," he was shunned by the Left Bank intelligentsia. In May 1968, as a university professor in Paris, he became known as reaction personified for counseling that teachers teach and students study — despite his criticism of the more-hidebound features of the French educational system. He has never been elected to the Academic Française, that closed circle of establishment intellect; he makes light of the New Philosophers, who share his critique of the Soviet Union.

He maintained an eyric at Le Figaro from 1947 to 1977, arguing early that France should give up Algeria, keeping his distance from the General, and juggling the work on editorials with his academic positions, including the Sorbonne chair of sociology he won in 1955. "I could have locked myself up in my ivory tower." he says, "and I probably would have written more books that would last, bot someone who decides to write about politics isn't thinking about posterity.

Still, Aron considers his contribution active. He quotes The Economist as saying, when he left Le Figaro in 1977 (because the publisher, Robert Hersant, announced he would share Aron's editorial space during the 1978 general elections), that he had influenced two generations of moderate politicians. At L'Express, the tradition continues in his weekly columns. "I am read by the political classes in France," he says, "I am quoted abroad."

In the United States, where he has lectured frequently on arms control, he feels he has "a certain moral authority." He was prominent in the 1950s in the CIA-supported intellectuals' organization, the Congress of Cultural Liberty, which he joined in good faith, not knowing, he says, the source of its funding; he recently backed down from the honorary presidency of Midge Decter's neo-conservative Committee for the Free

He seems unconcerned by the chill that has descended on East-West relations - he has seen it all before. After all, he recalls, the so-called period of detente in the 1970s was the period when the balance of forces was overturned. "Mr. Andropov and Mr. Reagan could be a little more civilized in their debate," he says, "but I do not have the impression that cither side wants war." He is worried by what he calls the ambivalent feelings of the West Germans on the issue of the installation of 107 Pershing-2s in Europe; this, he says, should prove more decisive than the arms negotiations, so many symbolic gestures in propaganda battles. He prefers to sum up with the title of a chapter in his book "The Great Schism," "Peace, impossible, war improbable."

Meanwhile, of his writing, Aron considers his work on Clausewitz's theory of war most likely to last; perhaps also the trilogy headed by the "18 Lessons on Industrial Society." An introduction to the German sociologists of the 1920s, written 50 years ago, has just been reprinted, untouched, in France, Italy and Japan. In addition to his two or three dozen published books, there is a flood of writings on arms and the man, sometimes prolix but remarkably consistent over the last 30 years. Yet, Aron says, "I'm criticized for not being dogmatic enough,"

Self-criticism is one thing, but other versions are difficult to take. Aron admits his skin is thin, and says that the memory of youthful bumiliations, like a banker uncle telling him he knew nothing about economics, is as powerful for him as Proust's madeleine. The memoirs give little of himself away, but weave an extensively documented fabric of apology and self-evaluation, "a re-examination," Aron calls it, "of what I thought in the past."

As for old adversaries, Aron is sick of discussing his classmate at the Ecole Normale Supericure. "I forbid you to ask me about Sartre," he tells an interviewer, making his point with an uncharacteristic expletive. He doesn't see why Sartre's career, his espousal of the Left, his quixotic sorties into politics, should so often be described as complementary to his. It's true they had the same philosophical training (Aron graduated top of the class of 1928; Sartre, delayed by a year, followed suit with a nigher score) but, Aron objects, he has never written any plays or novels, and sees no reason to compare Sartre's work with his. Their break in the 1950s - which in the memoirs Aron traces to his failure to defend Sartre on a radio program against a pack of Gaullists angry because Sartre had just likened De Gaulle physically to Hitler—was definitive, despite the handshake in 1979 at a conference on the Boat People. "He didn't fill my life, or I his," Aron says today.

On the other hand, he insists, there are the 12 or 15 friends, and the children and grandchildren, who do count in the private life of this public monument. Perhaps because he has so often been treated as an intellect, not a man, he is auxious not to leave the wrong impression. He seems hurt by an American journalist's recent description of him. "What exactly does 'highbrious' mean?" be asks. "And I don't think my face is " One has to agree. "Don't say my face is gloomy," he implores. "It's simply not true."

On the Rail-Bird Marshes, a Last Push

by Eugene Meyer

IG POINT, Maryland — Once, impor-tant people from Washington and Baltimore came to this landing on the Patuxent River, and to Lyons Creek and Mount Calvert and Jug Bay a few miles farther down river, to hunt the tiny but tasty rail bird that arrived each September on route to South America.

The hunters were guided in flat-bottomed, narrow skiffs through the marshes by burly men with strong arms and good balance who supplemented their farm incomes with money carned "pole pushing" the boats.

It was a way of life for generations. The rail-bird shooters included Teddy Roosevelt, Harry Truman, Babe Ruth, General Billy Mitchell and Jimmy LaFontaine, the legendary gambler. No less legendary were the pu Weepy Dyson, Fair Johnson, Jimmie Greenwell, Ralph Sunderland, the Bias brothers and many more.

Their domain was a mere five miles on the river. There grew the "oats" - marsh grass that the small-beaked birds loved to eat. But then pollution and sedimentation from encroaching civilization choked the marsh grass. The rail-bird population shrank, the pole pushers retired, the sportsmen found other quarry, and a tradition faded into history. Only 15 miles but a world away from the District of Columbia, the keepers of the past survive in dwindling numbers along the river.

Edna Greenwell, 83, watches television and receives visitors in the house where she used to book pole pushers for hunters and then pluck the birds for a few cents each. Raymond Whittington, 77, sits in his backyard near Lyons Creek, recalling his days as a pusher. "Years ago, if you had stood here today, you would've thought you'd heard a war on the river," Whittington said. The river was quiet as the rail-bird season officially opened early in September.

On the water were Leroy Harper, 75, a farmer, preacher and old-time pole pusher, and Eddie Brown, 70, a house-painter and hunter. Harper used a 16-foot wooden pole with 3 small feet on the bottom to push Brown's skiff through the Patuxent marshes. They were there just for old time's sake, "reviving history," said Brown. It was near high tide, when water is deep enough to pole far into the Patusent marsh, the former home of the sora rail, a plump, grey-brown wading bird about 8 inches long. When the tide was low, hunters would go "mudding" and shoot the weak-flying birds on the ground.

"I done been up and down this river. I know this marsh as good as anybody," said Harper. When that water was up, I didn't have no trouble. I got those birds for 'em and bring 'em Memories abound also in a register kept at the Glebe Club, which began around the turn of the century and closed during the Depression. On the first day of the 1907 season, a member wrote: "Rail in great quantity, but there was little shooting, the birds preferring to tread the mazes of the most luxuriant growth of wild outs and other marsh plants within the memory of the oldest pushers, rather than seek safety in flight.

"Wind southeasterly. Rail are here in the greatest numbers observed for several years," said an entry two weeks later. "One gunner killed 28 rail without changing position, every bird within a space of 20 feet." A hungry hunter could easily eat six birds at a single sitting. The shooters came by car and train, some by yacht. For some 20 years, the 83-foot converted Coast Guard yacht belonging to Alonzo Deck-er Jr. of the Black & Decker tool company plied its way up the Patuxent for the rail-bird

Often, the yacht anchored by Mount Calvert, Eddie Brown's place. On many occasions, Decker engaged Edna Greenwell to arrange for the pole pushers. Decker, who sold his boat several years ago, said he quit rail-bird hunting in the 1960s because "the pushers disappeared and the birds seemed to be disappearing."

A half-dozen skiffs sit at water's edge at Pig Point, but they belong to locals and aren't for hire, said Edua Greenwell. She didn't want her sons to become pushers, and they didn't, "It's too hard a work, and they can do better," she said. "They never pushed a soul, only them-

In the tradition's waning years, pushers made $20 a tide, according to Buddy Sunderland, 56, who pushed in high school and whose father pushed before him. Raymond Whittington, who is Sunderland's uncle, began pushing in 1920, when he was 14. Half a dozen pushers worked from his family's landing. "I'm the only one living," he said. "Early in the morning was always the best. We used to say the birds jumped better . . . If you had good, high water, wasn't too bad a jnb. But if you had just an ordinary tide and not too much water, it was just a terrible, terrible job." The river just isn't what it used to be, said Leroy Harper as Eddie Brown piloted his powerboat, a wooden skiff tied to its stern, to the marsh. "That was a good pushing marsh," Harper said. "It's all filled in now."

The boat powered into a channel, where Harper and Brown boarded the skiff. The legal limit is 15 birds; it had once been 100. They poled through the marsh on both sides but couldn't raise a rail bird. Brown felled a single blackbird

"I don't believe the birds are there," Harper said. "We didn't see a one today. Brown answered him: "Ain't nothing out there but hard work, Leroy."

EATTLE - The old "red barn" in which the Boeing Co. was born in 1916 is serving now as the centerpiece of the Museum of Flight, a combination of historical exhibits and educational programs that opened here last month.

The two-story wooden structure, originally designed as a yacht factory, looks a lot better now than it did when William Boeing paid $10 "and other considerations" for the building on the Duwamish River in south Seattle. Outside, the building has a new coat of paint; inside, the wood has been sand-blasted and finished to a fine sheen.

Exhibits in the new museum can be rolled against the wall when the building is used for special events ranging from large parties to a performance by the Seattle Symphony Orches-longs to the giant aerospace company.

It was bought decades ago by the county government and is now the property of the private, non-profit Museum of Flight Foundation, which moved the building to the museum site in 1975. Great sets of wheels were mounted under the building and it was rolled onto a barge for a short trip upriver, then rolled off and across the major thoroughfare that cuts through Boeing country.

"This building is special," says Georgia
Franklin, education director of the foundation. "You can just feel history come alive. In a very short time after we moved the building, our foundation membership zoomed from a few hundred to more than 18,000."

Although the building carries the Bocing name, only 30 percent of its interior will be devoted to the "Bocing story."

The rest of the space will be used to tell the story of people's dream of having the freedom of flight, from the earliest efforts on through

After Aoberge de l'Ill in Illhaeusem and Michel Guerard's Les Près d'Engénie in Eugénie-les-Bains, Baumanière remains one of France's most beautiful and romantic dining spots. Amid the columns of rocks, cliffs and hillsides, Baumanière rises like a bright, fresh and welcomi flower garden. And after nearly 40 years, it stands as a subdued, protective hideaway, an honest anberge where time passes slowly and no one need be in a hurry. The setting here — with a large and pleasant terrace for an apentif outdoors and expansive, stone-arched dining room indoors — provides e feeling of serenity and a proper sense of history. The founder, Raymond Thuilier, now 86, is still present, moving from table to table to char with the international clientele, some of whom have been coming since he gained his third Michelin star 29 years ago, making him the first student of Fernand Point to obtain the top Michelin rating.

Yet despite it all, there are sure signs of fading and neglect. Many among the staff could not be more attentive and interested. The others are just going through the motions. A meal at Banmanière is a little like attending the 2,999th performance of a Broadway musical: Half the performers are still youthfully enthusiastic, while the rest lost interest a few hundred performances ago.

After a rather awkward reception — when there was no one at the estaurant's entry to greet guests - a waiter rudely nodded to an empty table on the bright, flower-filled terrace, assuming we'd understand the sign language and take a seat. Twenty minutes later another waiter noticed we had neither drinks nor appetizers nor menus (we might not even have had a reservation, since no one asked). No apologies, but service did pick up. Along with a glass of champagne came some of the freshest, most professional puff-pastry appetizers I've ever sampled: tiny, crosssant-shaped pastries laced with anchovies, lively little pizzas, buttery cheese straws. They were about to be forgiven. Once inside service moved on at a perfect pace - no rushing, no endless pauses. Here one finds a menn and a style of cooking that come very close to what one imagines Point had in mind, not what is often emateurishly translated as nouvelle cuisine. Thrilier manages gracefully to bridge the gap between classic and nonvelle, and that's welcoming. Ingredients are fresh and imaginatively treated, and when a pigeon arrives, you know it is a pigeon; a rack of lamb resembles lamb. The menn does have a Provençal accent —local Alpilles lamb, rouget, or red mullet, with basil, plenty of eggplant - but it is the kind of menn that would serve well anywhere.

everybody will be asked if he would like to sample, perhaps, a little of

Excellent dishes sampled here include rouget à la nage au basilie, red nullet richly seasoned with olive oil and fresh basil; and a terrine. d'aubergines sauce potvron doux - chimles of lamb enveloped in thinly. sheed eggplant, served warm with a pleasant red pepper sauce; a perfectly sample but successful gratin Dauphiness and a same of fresh and tiny wild mourseron mushrooms. Unfortunately, main courses - including the carré d'agneau à la sariette and pigeon à ail nouveau — were disappointing. The lamb was tender but virtually flavorless, and if summer savory had been intended as a flavoring, it got lost somewhere in the kitchen. Every dish sampled lacked the most basic salt and pepper seasoning a sure sign that the kitchen isn't tasting its own food.

The mahogany and silver cheese trolley is not only an exquisite piece of furniture but also contains dozens of nicely aged cheeses, including a fine regional selection of chèrre. But it is sacrilege to serve such awful bread, and the bread sticks are just plain silly. Desserts were less interesting, including a banal tarte aux myrtilles with a soggy, undercooked crust.

The wine list also suffers from lack of recent attention. Why in a region that is blessed with outstanding wines at more than reasonable prices would the sommelier automatically open the page to a listing of red Bordeaux as he hands you the list? While regional specialities from Gigondas and Châteauneuf-du-Pape are fairly well-represented on the list, those offered come mainly from large producers, not from the smaller growers who produce far more exciting, and often betterquality, wines.

Still by choosing carefully one can have a wonderful experience. Definitely worth sampling is Châtean Simone's Palette, a tiny appella-tion south of Aix producing one of Provence's best wines, priced here at 65 francs (about $8) a half bottle. Palette has only two growers, the bestknown of which is Château Simone, producing about 4,000 cases a year. it's a lively young white — more than just for qualfing — that makes you sit up and take notice. Palette is produced from a combination of grapes, including ugni blanc, the grape used in making Cognac and white Côtes, du Rhône. Another good buy was the 1966 Châteanneuf-du-Pape— Beaucastel, ready for drinking now and well priced at 160 francs a

Zucchini, From Soup to Nuts

by Craig Claiborne

EW YORK - One of the timehonored rules of meno planning is that you should avoid duplicating a particular flavor, texture or ingredient during a given meal. If you serve pasts with tomato sauce, for example, you should not use tomatoes in any other form during the meal, be it in appetizer, soup, salad or main course. Brooke Swenson is an inventive cook with a lively sense of humor who not only has defied that basic tenet but has done so with highly satisfactory results. Not long ago, I heard, she served a meal at her home in Weston, Connecticut, each course of which consisted of one primary ingredient: zucchini. The interesting thing was that the guests were unaware that every dish they are was based on it. Only in the salad - made with thin, cold, briefly cooked slices - and in the rice, cooked with grated zucchini, did they detect its presence.

A midsummer challenge provoked Swenson to carry out this amusing feat, she explained when I called. "At harvest time I become, like many country wives, the victim of my husband's garden, the bumper crop of which issues from the corner devoted to that green

Italian squash.
"One day when planning my menu for an evening, I thumbed through hundreds of recipes for zucchini. I am a cookbook cook but alter recipes as I see fit. f found myself giggling at the thought of attempting them all, and the zucchini dinner was the result."

She noted that zucchini is both delicious and relatively neutral in flavor, so that it harmonizes exceptionally well with a wide range of ingredients; I agreed that there was scarcely another vegetable so adaptable. She invited me to visit her kitchen to watch the preparation of an all-zocchini meal.

When I arrived we plucked a few zucchini blossoms. These Swenson planned to stuff with turns and then batter-fry them to serve as an appetizer. She also lifted from the patch a giant ecimen, seven pounds in weight and more than two feet long.

She explained that the giants are as tender as when the seeds are scooped out. The seeds can be put to good use, too: "I remove them, rinse them and layer them in the bottom of a lightly oiled pan. I sprinkle them with a little sait and oregano and bake them at 325 degrees for about half an hour. They are excellent as a snack."

Returning to her stove, Swenson outlined her menu for the day. In addition to the blossoms, stuffed with time bound with yogurt and mayonnaise and neatly tied, bandanna-fashion, at the top, it included a novel "pizza" baked without a pastry base but using grated zucchini with a topping of cooked chicken, tomato, chopped peppers and cheese; a rice and zucchini casserole; a zucchini salad; a neatly spiced znechini dessert loaf with lemon sance, and, finally, cups of dark roasted coffee — "not double-roasted zucchini," she said.

Singapore Again Appeals for Courtesy

INGAPORE — Prime Minister Lee Kuan Yew is promoting his fifth annual campaign linking courtesy to productivity and economic development. "It is not easy to get people conscious of their personal and joint interests in considerate conduct," Lee said in a speech inaugurating the

The Toshogu Shrine was built in the first half of the 17th century and was consecrated to the Tokugawa shogunate, the last of the five families of shoguns, or military dictators, who ruled Japan for nearly 700 years under the nominal leadership of an emperor. Situated at the entrance to Nikko National Park, the shrine includes about 30 structures, nearly all of which have been designated by the Japanese government as national treasures or important cultural properties.

> Its style is a baroque version of the architecture of the Momoyama period (1573-98), which itself was known for a generosity of decorative detail. In scale and appearance, Toshogu looks Chinese: To build it, 15,000 of Japan's finest artists and craftmen were drafted into service, mostly from Kyoto and Nara. It is said that 2,489,000 sheets of gold leaf were used in gilding various rooms and exteriors, enough to cover 6 acres (2.4 hectares).

> Beginning in the town of Nikko itself, the long main street leads to the Sacred Bridge over the Daiya River. The arched span, 92 feet (28 meters) long by 24 feet wide, is lacquered red with gilt metal ornaments and rests on 2 buge stone supports at either end, shaped like torii, or shrine gates.

> According to legend, the bridge marks the spot where an eighth-century Buddhist priest, Shodo, crossed the river on the backs of two giant serpents on his pilgrimage to Mount Nantai. The original bridge, built in 1636 for use by the shogun and his messengers on their visits to the shrines, was destroyed by floods in 1902. It was rebuilt in 1907.

Just beyond the bridge is a monument erected by Masatsuna Matsudaira, one of the powerful dainyo, or feudal lords, of the 17th centuto many or ough water to bed now ry. Its inscription, dated April 17, 1648, states that he was responsible for the Japanese coder trees that were planted over the preceding two u.C. in agram Let 1.00% or chillings the start results and unita midthe roads from the sacred bridge to several

It is said that Masatsona Matsudaira planted the trees because he was either a bit poorer or more stingy than the other dainty, who contributed expensive offerings to the shrine. The Japanese cedars, he figured, would take much time and work but would be less costly. The 20 years of planting was completed in 1651. Today, 13,000 of the original trees still stand. And along the pathways surrounding the shrines, the sweet scent of these cedar spires hangs heavy in the air.

A short walk from the Sacred Bridge are the famed Nikko shrines. They are often referred to generically as Toshogu but in fact the shrine area has four main sections: Rinnoji Temple, the Toshogu Shrine, the Futaarasan Shrine and the Daiyu-in Mausoleum.

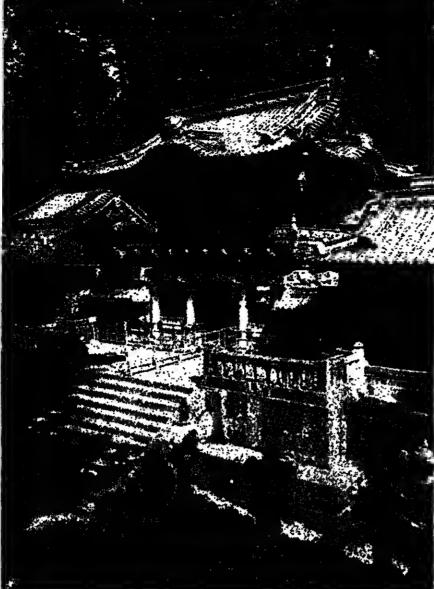

From the bridge, the Rinnoji Temple is on the right side of the avenue leading to the Toshogu Shrine. Once inside its front gate, the 2 copy grains successed about 1 hombo, or abbot's residence, can be seen on the right. This is where General Ulysses S. Ieyasu was LAMON DENERT SEE a harsh overlord who devised a system that heavily taxed the daimyo and kept them in court, where he could watch them. Employing this system, he and his descendants brought more than two centuries of enforced peace to Japan after 150 years of civil wars.

Of this assemblage, the tomb is the one simple structure, a comparatively uncluttered blackand gold building, with a stone monument protected by a lion and a crane statue. Most of the rest is a flood of extravagant, ornate craftsmanship. Viewing it is both dazzling and ex-

Probably most striking is the Yomeimon (Gate of Sunlight), which forms the opening to the oratory and main hall. It is popularly known as Higurashimon, or Twilight Gate, because people want to inspect it until twilight

Yomeimon is widely acknowledged as the most richly adorned traditional gate in Japan, a jewel reflecting many of the artistic techniques of the Momoyama period. With its 12 columns and 2 stories, Yomeimon Gate is 23 feet long, 15 feet deep and 37 feet high, Overhead, the visitor sees waves of carved, multicolored flora and fauna - lions, tigers, guaffes, foxes, badgers, tapirs, ducks, sages, princes, courtesans, children, peasants, unicorns, dragons, bamboo, flowers, pines twisting, growing, swarming, running, jumping, gamboling, growling and learing in every direction. This is the representative example of the art that has made Toshogu famous, but it is also a style that has been branded sheer architectural deca-

At the extremities of traditional Japanese architecture and design, it is said, are Toshogu and the Katsura Imperial Villa in Kyoto, with the latter representative of the elegant simplicity that has influenced modern design. Praising Katsura and belittling Toshogu became the fashion in Japanese intellectual circles espe-cially after a German architect, Bruno Taut, emigrated to Japan in the 1930s and called Katsura "an eternal thing," comparing its significance to the Parthenon in Athens.

Tant's enthusiasm caused Japanese intellectuals of the time to reappraise Katsura, a building that had been all but ignored for the previous 150 years. The Japanese have been flocking to Nikko's Toshogu, however, for cen-

Wherever one's esthetic sympathies lie, Toshogu's appearance is not the result of the idiosyncratic or frivolous tastes of a powerful ruler. Its style derives from its function. Toshogn was built to deify leyasu and thereby sanctify the authority of the Tokugawa shogunate. (Indeed, Ieyasu was posthumously named East-Illuminating Incarnation of a Bo-dhisattva and made a Buddhist deity.) Accordingly, Toshogu was designed to dis-play its size and its costliness. And the purpose of the elaborate ornamentation and detailing was to leave the observer with a sense of awe, dramatically demonstrating the wealth and power of the shogunate. The cost of all this, and the resulting taxation of the feudal lords. leaving them too impoverished to mount challenges to the rule of the Tokugawa family, may have also been a consideration.

The symbolism and the storytelling in the carved images that adorn Toshogu's many buildings are reminders that authority is to be obeyed. For example, the sacred stable is decorated with a carved version of the three monkeys in the famous "Hear no evil, speak no evil, see no evil" poses. Japanese scholars point out that this image is a reminder that in a feudal society the people are expected to follow, and that Japanese of the Edo period understood the point perfectly. To underline the belief that Toshogu's style results from its function, it is sometimes noted that the shogun who built it also oversaw the design of a garden for Edo Castle that is said to rival that of Katsora in its screne simplicity.

The Futaerasan Shrine is a short way from the Toshogu Shrine. Futaarasan enshrines three Shinto deities that, according to belief, bring prosperity to the country. Their origins can be traced to Mount Futaara - the present Mount Nantai. In fact, the Futaarasan Shrine is three shrines: this one, one at the foot of the mountain on the shore of Lake Chuzenii and one at the summit.

At the entrance of the shrine near Toshogu is a striking bronze torii gate that is 22 feet high. Though Futaarasan boasts a Chinese gate, its style is more subdued than that of its famous neighbor. At the southwest corner of the main shrine is an antique bronze lantern that is 71/2 feet high, called Bake-Doro (Goblin Lantern).
It is said to have assumed the shape of a goblin at night. One night some swordsmen slashed it; the scratches are still visible. The Futaarasan Main Hall, built in 1619, is the oldest building

Just beyond Futaarasan is the Daiyu-in Mausoleum of Iemitsu, the third Tokugawa shogun. The layout of lemitsu's mausoleum is roughly the same as Toshogu but the scale is smaller, the style and ornamentation are simpler and the crowds smaller. Beyond Toshogu, Nikko National Park, with its mountain scenery, ancient trees, rivers, lakes and waterfalls, is a concatenated topography created by volcanic activity with Mount Nantai, a dormant volcano rising 8,150 feet above sea level, as its centerpiece. The lava flows of eons past dammed mountain streams on a high plateau, forming Lake Chuzenji. The drive from the train station up to Chuzenji is a succession of hairpin turns, with the view back down the slope improving as the visitor goes. In the fall, it becomes a kaleidoscope of multicolored foliage, which is why this is Nikko's most popular tonnist season.

The buge Kegon (Flower Garland) Fall is an outlet for Lake Chuzenji. The water runs through a forest and over the tree-lined escarpment, as if it had taken a wrong turn thousands of years ago and kept its aberrant course. Then it drops nearly 330 feet in a 10-foot-wide ribbon, piercing the pool below. The result is a mesmerizing aquatic descent accompanied by a steady, pleasant rumble.

The Japanese have a saying, "Never say magnificent until you've seen Nikko." The Toshogu Shrine and its surroundings are mainly responsible for it.

Let Complete HILADELPHIA - When 13 families from Krefeld, Germany, arrived in the New World on Oct. 6, 1683, they settled in a place G ba where the water was pure and the air was clean. The site of that Germantown, today is a mixture of cobblestone streets, quaint houses, barbed wire and graffiti-covered walls. Residents say that there isn't fluch that is German left in Germantown, which was incorporated as part of Philadelphia 100 years 200

Nevertheless, the tricentennial of the arrival of the Quakers and Memonites who sailed for 75 days on the ship Concord to escape religious and political persecution is being heralded as an occasion to revive ancestral ties between the two nations and to promote German-Americans.

Americans.

"Everybody else has got their parade and we've been lost," says Frank Finnegan, spokesman for the Steuben Society of America in New York. Now we're letting the word get out to Washington that we are the baggest and we are the best."

But the hoopla is being lost on some descendants of early German families.

Lyda Updegrave, 67, who traces her roots to the Op den Graefs who arrived on the Concord, says she doesn't care much about the tricentennial. "Everybody has to come from somebody," says I have the Graefs who the Graefs who lives in the Lutheran Home arrived on the Concord, says she doesn't care much about the tricentennial. "Everybody has to come from somebody," says Updegrave, 67, who lives in the Lutheran Home, an old-age residence, on the fringe of the Germantown section.

Germantown was once a manufacturing power in southeastern Penn-sylvania, known for its mills and the invention of a rugged wagon used by early settlers to travel west. But it fell on hard times in the last three decades. Vernon Park, which has a statue of Germantown's founder, Daniel Pastorius, is bordered by a closed branch of the Free Library of Philadelphia, protected by barbed wire topping a crude, plywood fence.

Some community leaders think that what has happened in the last few decades is part of the area's history and should not be overlooked in the tricentennial, which is expected to draw many tourists from Germany. Other groups celebrating the tricentennial are worried that it may be used as a political forum to promote a foreign policy that would have horrified the pacifist settlers — stationing U.S. missiles in Germany, a policy supported by the Reagan administration. Two branches of the Mennonite Church recently passed a resolution condemning what they felt was the use of the tricentennial for that purpose. Nancy Rhoads, who is organizing a Germantown Founders' Day dinner and who says her forebears included at least four of the Krefeld families, says she thought drawing attention to Germantown's place in history was worthwhile but looking for evidence of its German roots probably was futile. "I don't think of Germans when I think of Germantown," she says. "The settlers had a fair number of children and most of them moved out and away. It's just a melting pot. I don't pick the Germans out."

UBLIN - It could have been the view, or the sun - which made one of its surprise appearances in time to whip us all up some bright red cheeks — or the placidness, because there's nothing very strenuous about a Shannon cruise. The Shannon is lazy and slow. Fat and indolent, "The River Shannon ain't fast or wide but there's lots of pubs on either side." We tried singing that after yet another stop at a country pub among another row of cottages aughably calling itself a village.

There can be a lot of singing on a Shannon cruise, for the simple reason that cruising upstream and down is a passive, anxiety-free sort of exercise. It also encourages a lot of wine and Guinness to disappear. We were three men and two women in a boat and we brought a total of eight bottles of wine plus a tank of beer with a tap. We had chosen the Shannon for our long weekend mini-cruise because it is a river with lakes every now and again, so we felt that we couldn't get lost, really.

We chose the bit oear Portumna, where the river opens into Lough Derg - 24 miles (38 kilometers) long and 2 to 6 miles wide - because we'd heard about its liveliness. If the Shannon has a racy après-cruise scene by night it happens around the tiny villages fringing Lough Derg all the way from Portumna to Killaloe in County Limerick. Those who want utter stillness and wildlife and the forest should start at the other end in Carrick-on-Shannon and go into Lough Key past the rains of Rockingham House.

Our cruiser was one of 10 types and sizes and designs on loan from the Emerald Star Line, which moors the boats either in the Carrick-on-Shannon marina or in Portumna beside the huge swing bridge that guards the lough. We needn't have fretted about our competence as captains. A cheery man called John Le Froy showed us a 10-minute film that made everything look doom-ridden; the dangers of going too near an angler in a rowboat too fast, how to go past the red and black buoys into uncharted areas and perch right atop a rock, how to go sideways through a bridge and get stuck.

Then another cheery man, Mick Horrigan, showed us how to push in the throttle and go backward and stop. Then Horrigan slapped our boat, Cappincore Star, on the rump and we were on our own. Our resident exsailor crammed on a tennis visor to denote anthority, and after a few

"Aye aye, sirs" and undoing of wrong ropes, it was anchors aweigh.
Our maiden voyage described a large circle. We were so relieved to find we could stay between the markers and drive Cappincore Star around Lough Derg without ramming any other boat that we forgot to notice we were mooring just around the corner from where we began, in front of the astonishing bulk of Portamna Castle.

All places in Ireland are trips down the time tunnel, more or less, and Portumna Castle with its castellated tops and its series of interlocking Gothic gateways breathes a million strange tales of those who lived there. It has a sad 17th-century plaque dedicated to "the best friend a man could have," a dog. We were appalled to discover we could walk back from here, braving heifers and bullocks, to the place we set out Steaming over to Terryglass across the bay we found Paddy's, an admirable establishment with green-painted caves and window casements and an ancient license written in delicate white over the front door. Famed for good food as well as good pints, Paddy's is always bursting with people shrieking and singing and making indiscriminate

When we weren't eating at Paddy's, we found that cooking in the Cappincore was our great delight, because of our little cruiser kitchen with its profusion of drawers and neat cupboards and flaps to put things on. There was a fridge and cooker and hot water, and a first-aid kit and flares and a flashlight and a radio. We learned very fast what the flashlight was for, the first couple of times we had to find our way back from Paddy's at midnight. Going to bed in the Cappincore was strange, not least because bedding is hidden away in the oddest parts of the boat. And all the other boats stayed up until dawn making a little loud night

Fleeing to a more peaceful stop in the next mooring place northeast of Terryglass we found the wooded abundance of Gurthaloughna House, a Place that manages to fulfill the functions of bed-and-breakfast, café, antique shop with craft shop attached, and garden center to boot. Run by a jolly young couple called Bessie and Michael Wilkinson, it is a sprawingly untity house with an unexpected courtyard in its middle, nine bedrooms with or without bathrooms, and a library.

The Gurthaloughna trees and the other woods along the Lough Derg shores recall how much Ireland was once forested, and a bit of broadleaf and deciduous are a reminder of more ancient days. A poem all Irish children learn in school, beginning "Oh what shall we do for the woods, the woods of Kilclash are cut down!" was composed not a full county away, more than three centuries ago.

In the summer, heavenly smells from clematis, wisteria and honeysuckle weave the walls of Gurthaloughna. Beyond a huge patch of giant wild rhubarb is a burial vault where generations of the last century lie at the bottom of some slippery steps in the middle of the woods.

Our only mistake at this stage was to go to a little marina by a village called Dromineer with a hideously modernized hotel called The Sail Inn. A lovely view from the upstairs bar is its big asset, but the restaurant managed to defy every attempt to keep the modest-enough meal down to less than 20 Irish pounds ($23) a head. The Irish Tourist Board promotes a tourist menu of three courses for £5.95 a head, but Irish restaurants are legendarily overpriced and good at sticking you for service and marking up bottles of the rough rude house red. The Sail Imm was a busy place with a busy disco and a busy staff, but for restaurants, there is more consistency in Mountshannoo or Scarriff or Killaloe on the other side of the lough.

We got a slice of another Shannon, too; two ancient lough gates on the way to the unearthly spell of Clonmacnoise, an important ecclesiastical center of the seventh and eighth centuries, with its high crosses and bundreds of grave slabs and seven churches.

And every stop has another pub, with 10 old men nursing their pints, smiling and wishing visitors a grand day. Then there are the lock-keepers and their families, the cormorants and the otters, the other boats we met and the crazy things that happened on the way back. See for yourself.

Doing It Yourself, Ecologically

by James T. Yenckel

ASHINGTON — In a quiet mountain valley in North Caroli-na, the editors of Mother Earth News magazine have set up a lunge park called Eco-Village, where visitors can learn the do-it-yourself skills of pioneers. It is, says a spokesman, John Vogel, "a theme park for independent living — a get-down and getdirty Disneyland."

The park, just south of Asheville near Hendersonville, attracted 20,000 visitors last year, when it opened; this year the number is expected to be 30,000.

The Idea behind Eco-Village is to help people find less expensive options for housing, food and fuel by potting their minds and muscles to work harnessing the sun, the wind and the water. Self-sufficiency is an Eco-Vil-

Informal classes offer a mixture of the old and the new. There is instruction, for example, in building a log cabin, a cheap form of housing that requires such skills as selecting cutting and peeling the trees and notching, fitting and chinking the logs. A more-modern housing concept is the do-it-yourself, solar-heated home that can be built into a hillside for greater energy savings. Eco-Village, where a model has been constructed, calls it a "homestead on a shoestring."

In one corner of the park, the staff has built a solar greenhouse to show how to grow fresh vegetables year-round while helping to heat a bome. In the demonstration kitchen, foodpreservation -- canning, freezing, drying and storage — is featured as an aid to greater self-sufficiency and cheaper food bills.

Extensive outdoor vegetable plots utilize the latest biodynamic methods of intensive gar-dening to increase productivity with plants healthy enough to resist bugs without the help

Other skills, all geared for home use, include bread-making, bee-keeping, alcohol fuel production, fish farming, backyard livestock raising and wind-electric and hydroelectric sys-

The demonstration sites, many of them open-air, are scattered in meadows beside a large lake. Fishing and boating are available laced with hiking and riding trails. More than 20 classes are offered, on a schedule of about 10 a day with repetitions through-out the week. To attend them all, says Vogel, takes at least two to three days. Instructors frequently are writers and editors from Mother Earth News, a one-million circulation maga-

Eco-Village is open daily through Oct. 22. and will reopen again next May. The hours are 8 A.M. to 6 P.M., with demonstrations beginning at 9:30 A.M. The entrance fee is $6 a person a day. For $7 a night, visitors can stay at the 200-site campground. As an ecological research center, Eco-Village lets no opportunity go to waste. The restaurant, open for breakfast, lonch and snacks, serves natural foods from the park's organic gardens. And the campground bathhouse is heated by solar power. For more information, write The Mother Earth News Eco-Village, Box 70, Henderson-ville, North Carolina 28791 or telephone (704)

Woes of French Electronics Industry Highlighted by Trade Show in Paris

DARIS -France's hopes and frustrations in its effort to stimulate the growth of its electronics industries were underscored by the 34th annual International Trade Show for Data Processing Telematics, Communication, Office Automation and Office Organization, known as SICOB, which highlighted recent trends in the field of computers and Nine days of exhibits by 866 manufacturers from 27 countries, which ended last Friday, featured the latest in everything from office furniture to document destroyers. As at every year's exhibition, the principal attraction for the about 420,000 visitors was the wide range of computer and electronics equipment on dis-

Although the public was not treated to the presentation of many new products, the products ou display helped illustrate the evolution in technology and thinking in the computer industry over the past year. Visitors hardy enough to make their way through the crowds and 89,700 square meters (969,000 square feet) of exhibition space noted the following electronics industry has been evident since the Socialists took power. One of the most striking aspects of the show was the preponderance of versatile, high-powered, personal micro-computers. The ma-chines, Apple's Lisa and IBM's PC, for example, are marked by greater sophistication and computing power than ever before. They are being designed for a multitude of such functions as general accounting and graphics representations, in addition to word processing, the ability to prepare home budgets and the like, and games. Then o Third of a Market all computer and office equipment makers are assuring compatibility in their product lines in expectation of increasing office automation. Micro-computers are turning into work stations and various pieces of office equipment are made compatible so that, eventually, they can be linked together in local networks. · Videotex compatibility proved to be the rule rather than the exception at the show. Manufacturers are clearly taking this technology seriously. This technology connects terminals or computers to centralized data banks via standard telephone lines. • Computer terminals are evolving in important ways. Many manufacturers, Sweden's Ericsson and France's Bull, for example, now offer terminals for business use with color capabilities. And most seem to be making at least modest efforts to improve their machines' ergonomy, ### which means making the products more comfortable and more conve-Booming Worldwide Industry

While offering a glimpse of a booming worldwide industry, the show ran this year against a backdrop of failed European industrial cooperation, and the continuing lack of commercial success of French electronics

The government's dedication to stimulating the growin and success to the French electronics industry has been evident ever since the Socialists came to power a little more than two years ago. As recently as last week, laurent Fabius, the minister of industry and research, reiterated that the promotion of the filiere electronique, the government's electronics pro-industria gram, is "the No. I priority of the country's industrial policy."

The government program has included greatly increased public spending on research, the development of telematics, which is the union of information technology and communications technology, and officeautomation applications, and a push for more European cooperation in the face of U.S. and Japanese competition.

However, for the moment at least, the reality corresponds little to the dream. Europe has proven itself incapable of the accommodation recessary to develop industrial consortiums, the government-controlled Postal and Telecommunications Authority remains the telematics industry's principal client, and the country continues to bear the burden of a foreign trade deficit in electronics goods. In 1982 France had a foreign trade deficit of 5.8 billion francs ($734.2 million) for computers and of 4 billion frances for office equipment.

In response to the industry troubles, two of the country's largest nationalized companies, CGE and Thomson-Brandt, are seeking to sell and barter parts of their overlapping industrial interests to each other. The resulting de facto partition of the electronics marketplace is intended to help them focus their commercial strategies and shed money-losing

One of the only positive developments has been the launching of the "Esprit" project, which unites European Community countries in basic research in information technology.

Most French and foreign observers agree that the country is plagued by a lack of aggressiveness on the part of its industrialists.

Perhaps for this reason, Abel Farnoux, president of the government's electromics program, wrote in the Sept. 22 issue of Le Monde, "On the occasion of SICOB, where one finds technological innovation, let us not forget that in the end it is commercial dynamism that will assure the

Saudis Consider Marketing Plan

Sale of Oil Products Abroad Being Weighed, Says Yamani

By Judith Miller New York Times Service

JEDDAH - Saudi Arabia is "seriously studying" buying a mar-keting network abroad to sell oil products from its new refineries, the oil minister, Sheikh Ahmed Zaki Yamani, said in an interview. Sheikh Yamani would not be more specific, but he expressed considerable enthusiasm for the

[In New York, John H. Lichtblau, director of the Petroleum In-dustry Resarch Foundation, said of Saudi Arabia's interest in buying a marketing octwork: "The risk is that it is harder to control the price of the product than of the crude since product prices must meet competition in the marketplace."

[He also said that Saudi Arabia would have little trouble finding such a marketing octwork, as a number of large oil companies "want to get out of them because they are oot as profitable as crude-oil production is."] Sheikh Yamani also said in the interview Tuesday that oil prices, depressed by the current worldwide oversupply, would begin increasing gradually. "Oil is so valuable, and it will become even more valuable very soon," be said. He added that Saudi Arabia produced fewer than five million barrels of oil a day during the third quarter. Currently, it is producing more, he said, but is storing the oil, oot selling it, at considerable cost. Sheikh Yamani said Saudi Arabia had been forced to pump more oil than it could sell because it required large quantities of the natural gas that is gathered as oil is produced. Several of the new inlustries established at Jubail on the gas-fucled. "We have a gas problem," he asserted. "Last June we had a complete blackout in the Eastern Province because of gas shortages." Sheikh Yamani also said Saudi Arabia had established 'a 'Swiss trading concern to sell on a "oneshot basis' some of the extra oil that was being produced. He de-nied reports that the company, Norbec, had been set up to enable Saudi Arabia to sell secretly more oil than its share agreed on with other members of the Organization of Petroleum Exporting Countries.

OPEC agreed in March that each of the 13 member nations should limit oil output to bolster weakening prices. Saudi Arabia's portion of the total comes to about five million barrels a day.

Sheikh Yamani predicted that by the end of 1985, "God willing," Saudi Arabia would be producing enough gas that was not associated with oil to alleviate the existing shortages. "We need Norbec now, not later," he said. "It's a tempo-

U.S. Retail Sales Rose Last Month

The Associated Press NEW YORK --- Sales by major U.S. retailers rose in September, the third consecutive month of growth.

Analysts said warm weather in the early part of the month may have burt sales by discouraging some shoppers from buy-including sales of Simpson-Sears Ltd. in Canada, which was acquired in July, sales for the period rose 11 percent.

K mart Corp., the second-largest retailer, said its sales increased 8.8 percent to $1.64 billion for the five weeks ended The third-largest retailer, J.C.

Penney Co., said its sales were up 5.1 percent to $956 million for the five weeks ended Oct. 1.

GM Plans to Recall 24,000 Workers

LOCKPORT, New York (Reuters) - General Motors Corp. has

sidecided to recall 24,000 more laid-off employees, Chairman Roger B.
Smith said Thursday at a 75th anniversary celebration for the company.

He said GM has brought back 66,000 laid-off U.S. employees since Jan. 1. The company had announced on Wednesday that it will reopen an assembly plant in Lakewood, Georgia, recalling about 1,650 employees.

BRASILIA (Combined Dispatches) — President João Baptista Fi-gueiredo has said he will reconsider a law that keeps salary increases well

The House of Representatives was expected to veto the law in an improming vote. Mr. Figueiredo, in a televised speech Wednesday night, said be was willing to compromise on the measure, which reduces raises to 80 percent, instead of the previous 100 percent, of the cost-of-living index. Brazil's official annual inflation rate is 153 percent.

The law is a crucial part of an austerity program to curb inflation and talance the budget, which the International Monetary Fund has required before it will reactivate a $4.9-billion loan for Brazil, which has stopped paying principal on its $90-billion foreign debt and is $2 billion behind on interest payments. Representatives of Brazil and foreign banks were innecting in Washington Thursday to discuss Brazil's request for exten-sions on repayment of $12 billion in loans.

Mr. Bushkin has denied any wrongdoing in the case. He served as a director of the bank from May 1978 through April 1982, according to court papers.

Mr. Saxon had made a SI-mil-bon der sit in the bank last year. After being dissolved, Commercial Bank was succeeded by First Credit Bank of California, based in Rlythe, California.

Joseph Mahoney, the successor bank's president, said Wednesday that First Credit had assumed some of the assets and liabilities of Commercial Bank through the Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. and that Mr. Saxon was one of the depositors. A total of $10.9 million in assets and $23 million in habilities were assumed, he said. Mr. Saxon was reportedly a director of Com-mercial Bank, but he had no connection with the successor, Mr. Mahoney said. It was unclear when bank's directors. The suit unsuccessfully charged Mr. Bushkin, as a director, with improperly permitting the bank's funds to be used by kin's law firm. Mr. Bushkin confirmed that Mr. Arfa had worked there, but said he had never met Mr. Saxon. "I don't know the first thing about Bullion Reserve," he

> The remaining principals in Bul-lion Reserve filed bankruptcy proccedings on Monday and also filed up to 20 lawsuits against individ-uals and companies. Among the defendants named in the suits were two Beverly Hills businessmen, Arnold Kopelson and Michael Miller, who were accused of jointly holding $1.7 million in cash belonging to Bullion Reserve.

Mr. Kopelson and Mr. Miller were the parties who sued Mr. Bushkin last spring charging the improper use of bank funds. The suit was thrown out in August by Judge Laughlin Waters of U.S. District Court in Los Angeles, who told the plaintiffs to make their allegations more specific. Mr. Kopelson and Mr. Miller could not be reached for comment.

Mr. Saxon apparently turned to suicide after learning that New York authorities had started an investigation into his company. The authorities reported little headway Wednesday in tracing the missing

Paradyne Contempt Citation Is Sought

By Kenneth B. Noble

New York Times Service WASHINGTON ---- The Securities and Exchange Commission has asked a federal judge to hold Para-dyne Corp. in contempt of court on the ground that the data-processing equipment company is deliberately thwarting an investigation into charges that it used fraud to obtain a $100-million government computer contract Paradyne officials contend that the SEC motion, filed Sept. 27 in federal district court in Tampa, Florida, is an attempt to force the company to resume negotiations over a settlement, rather than go to trial. An SEC spokesman denied this motive, asserting that the agency was merely trying to prepare its case for trial.

Paradyne has denied that it has blocked the investigation. Earlier, it accused the SEC of reaching beyond the securities laws and it insisted that it had won the Social Security Administration contract

The SEC has accused Paradyne of violating the securities laws by filing financial reports with the agency that contained false statements about the company's ability to fulfill a contract with the Social Security Administration. To sus-tain those charges, the agency has to show that Paradyne made fraudulent representations in winning

"The SEC has decided to wage a peculiar form of warfare against Paradyne," said Calvert Crary, a lawyer and litigation analyst at Bear, Stearns & Co.

Paradyne has denied that it engaged in any improper or unlawful behavior in competing for the con-tract, and has said that it has dis-closed all "material information." Paradyne argues that the Social Security Administration has never contended that the company has failed to meet its contractual obligations under the contract.

FATAL VISION

By Joe McGinniss: 663 pp. $17.95. Putnam, 200 Madison Ave., New York, N.Y. 10016.

Reviewed by Christopher Lehmann-Haupt

A S I began reading Joe McGimniss's "Fatal Visions"—the latest nonfiction work by the author of "The Selling of the President," "Heroes" and "Going to Extremes"—I wasn't certain f was really up to another true-crime investigative report in the approximate style of Truman Capote's "In Cold Blood" and Norman Mailer's "The Executioner's Song."

It wasn't already knowing the outcome of the so-called Green-Beret munder case that bothered me. For though the story of Dr. Jeffrey R. MacDonald and his conviction in 1979 for the 1970 murder of his pregnant wife and two young daughters had of course been extensively covered in the media; I had succeeded in forgetting whatever details I knew, as I invariably manage to do whenever reading a nonfiction book that depends to any degree on the course for its progress to also the content. It nonfiction book that depends to any degree on suspense for its power to absorb the reader. It was the tantalizing not knowing that I think f dreaded—the ultimate and inevitable inability of McCinniss to get inside his subject's head and tell us exactly what was going on there. Either that, or he would duck that particular metters and one would duck that particular metters are the second of the second ular matter and ponder the significance of MacDonald's crime to the condition of the American psyche, which I wasn't in the mood

But I was wrong in my foreboding. McGinniss does a masterly job of reviving one a interest in the crime and leading us on through his narrative reconstruction, which consists of Jeffrey MacDonald's tape-recorded autobio-graphical notes; transcripts of the various legal graphical notes; transcripts of the various legal proceedings; third-person accounts told from the viewpoint of several key figures in the case, including Freddy Kassab, MacDonald's father-in-law, who was to become a form of hellhound following the number suspect's trail; and the personal testimony of the author, who was invited by MacDonald to get to know him intimately and tell his story, with the presumed result that, regardless of the outcome of the trial, a book was bound to exonerate him.

What draws us on, initially, is the combina-tion of the hornfic brutality of the murdess, the seemingly strong circumstantial evidence against the suspect, and the quality of the sections called "The Voice of Jeffrey MacDonrid," which, coming as they do from a suppos-edly intelligent, sophisticated man, are suspa-cously cliched, inarticulate and even evasive. How can he possibly clear himself, we have to wonder at first. How can the Army's investigative hearings NOT lead to court-martial proceedings? How can it be that at the start of "Fatal Vision," where McGinniss first meets MacDonald nearly a decade after the hearings, he is only then facing trial for the murder of his case is sprung and the tables are reversed.

Suddenly we learn how ineptly the Army's Criminal Investigation Division (CID) has handled the case and that there is apparently solid ground for MacDonald's version of events, which is that he and his family were attacked by a gang of hippies, including a woman carrying a candle and saying "Acid is Groovy!" and "Kill the pigs!" When the Army dismisses the charges against MacDonald, the only question that remains is what McCimmiss has left to write about for nearly 500 pages.

Then when Kassah

Then when Kassab and the CID discover stronger evidence against the doctor and reverse the tables again, we find ourselves wondering once more about contradictions between the suspect's unexceptionable. personality and the viciousness of the crime. And if he did it, did he know that he did it? And under any circumstances, would be possibly confess?

From this point on, you are on your own, because, even though you may recall that Mac-Donald was eventually found guilty in 1979, "Fatal Vision" turns up a lot that's new about the case. I have only a few points to add. First, though I've grown increasingly measy about the practice of psychohistory, I think that McGinmiss has delivered the goods. After all, he did have access to the detailed psychological profile that was drawn of the doctor, and after all he got to know him intimately. In any case, the fascinating theory he poses seems plausible

Second, I did have the sense at times while reading "Fatal Vision" that I was being mamp plated by the narrative—that is, material was being withheld or revealed largely to make the story more dramatic. But without having gone back over the book carefully enough to make a considered judgment, I suspect that a case can be made that the shifts in point of view are reasonably true to the way the case developed and that the drama is there legitimate. If McGimmis has contrived his arrangement of the material just a little bit, I guess we can forgive him out of regard for the effectiveness of his drama.

Finally, there are the questions that must: rise concerning the author's relationship with rise concerning the author's relationship with his subject — a relationship that the subject hoped, was developing into a real friendship. Even though the subject's ulterior motive was clearly to use that friendship for the purpose of proving his innocence, there are bound to be those readers who feel that McGinniss has exploited and betrayed a friendship. In some of his previous books McGinniss has not always made it so clear where he stood in relation to his subject. But "Fatal Vision" smells of integrity, and that's one of the many things about it that make it irresistible to read, even if its that make it irresistible to read, even if its vision of the human soni is somewhat bleak and frightening.

Murray, so seldom a goat in his magnificent career, had an awful game. He misjudged Greg Luzins-ki's pop-up in the second, broke in the wrong direction twice and eventually overran what became a wind-blown double. In the seventh, he charged the plate in a bunt situation only to be embarrassed again as loser Scott McGregor, thinking Murray had ealled a pickoff, stepped toward the unoccupied first base and drew a balk.

Murray swung at the first pitch -a low-away fast ball off the plate - and sent a grounder back through the mound for a routine, game-ending force at second base. Thus ended his zero-for-four day. The White Sox claim that they

Valenzuela Delivers 4-1 Triumph Before Playoff Goes East

By Mark Heisler

Los Angeles Times Service LOS ANGELES - Fernando Valenzuela, coming off his worst season, pitched eight strong innings Wednesday night and carried the Los Angeles Dodgers back into the National League playoff with a 4-1 victory over the Philadelphia

He left in the ninth inning in favor of Tom Niedenfuer, who got the side out and stranded two baserunners. The Dodgers managed six hits, were handed three unearned runs and thus managed to beat the Phillies and even the series at one

The series will now move to Phildelphia for the third game Friday. The Phillies will have the advantage of playing at home. The Dodg-ers will have the advantage of sending Bob Welch out for Game 3 against a rookie, Charles Hudson. Valenzuela gave up a second-inning home run to Gary Matthews and then held the Phillies off until the ninth. Then the first hitter, Matthews, got an infield hit. Valen-zuela ran a 2-and-0 count on Garry Maddox, and Manager Tom La-sorda walked resolutely out of the dugout. Valenzuela was history. He didn't go quietly, though Placid, well-mannered and all, he could be seen walking up and down the dugout, waving his arms.

"I wasn't unhappy," he said later, talking through an interpreter.
"In the ninth inning, I wasn't throwing well it was time to come out."

"Then what was all the arm waving about?" I was just stretching my arms,"

It was the second time that Maddox, perhaps the best centerfielder of his time, made a memorable error in a playoff game in Dodger

In the 1978 playoff, Maddox dropped Bill Russell's line drive to allow the winning run to score in the fourth and deciding game. Wednesday night, he chased down a long drive by Valenzuela to center his glove as he backpedaled, then tripped, fell backward and dropped the ball. Valenzuela steamed into

The score was then 1-1, Ken Landreaux having singled in a run in the first, Matthews having hit his homer in the second.

Phillies Manager Paul Owens pulled in the infield. John Denny hen retired Steve Sax on a grounder to second. Greg Brock hit a grounder to third and Valenzuela, trying to score, was a dead duck at

"That was a mistake," Valenzuela said later, "probably because I don't get on base quite so often."
There were two out and a runner at first then, but Denny walked Dusty Baker, and there went the option of pitching around Pedro Guerrero. Guerrero sliced a 2-and-2 pitch into the right-field corner, which kicked backward and rolled past Sixto Lezcano. Both base run ners scored. The Dodgers led, 3-1. Valenzuela worked an easy sixth and retired the first two hitters in the seventh before Ivan DeJesus singled to left. Owens sent up Tony Perez to bit for Denny, and Perez singled to left, too.

Up came Joe Morgan. He hit a line drive down the right-field line, hooking toward the line, where Mike Marshall dived and caught it. Said Owens: "Guerrero's ball fell in. Joe's ball didn't. That was the difference in the ballgame."

That was the seventh. With one out in the next inning, Mike Schmidt bunted safely down the grounder to Russell and the Dodginfield turned its third double play of the night. With two out in the bottom of ood, rookie catcher Jack Fimple strike three, batting and Valenzuela due up next. Owens let Reed pitch to Fim- Game 2

Lasorda was hoping to contain things before the tying run got to the plate, but Niedenfuer threw balls three and four to Greg Gross, and up came the tying run in pinch-hitter Joe Lefeb-vre, a .310 hitter after the Phillies acquired him in mid-season from the Padres.

Niedenfuer struck out Lefebvre with a high, blazing fastball. Owens Schmidt bunted safely down the sent up his third straight left-hand-third base line, but Lezcano bit a ed pinch-hitter, the star-crossed Von Hayes. Niedenfuer retired Hayes on a weak pop fly to Russell in short left field.

Look at My Snapshots

By Russell Baker

FEW YORK - Since return-EW YORK — Since returning from England, we have seen no one. Nobody has dropped by, nobody has phoned. Friends and relatives, invited to come by and socialize, say they will be too busy until after Christmas.

I know what's up. It's the snapshot problem. Everybody is afraid that, given half a chance, we will show them our snapshots, will seat them comfortably in the parlor. bring them coffee and cookies, seal the doors and then make them look at 337 snapshots.

Yes, that is the precise number of snapshots we've brought back from England. Three hundred and thirty-seven. I have them right here, hot of course you wouldn't want to look at them, I suppose.

A few of these, though, are really very good, and several are even in focus. For example, this one of me sitting oo the bank of the Avon reading Macaulay's "History of England." You can't really tell it's the Avon. It sort of looks like your run-of-the-mill creek, hut you've got to admit the ducks are interesting and, though this snapshot doesn't show it, there's an old 15thcentury bridge off there to the left.

But never mind, I understand this can't possibly interest you. though there's an interesting story behind this picture of me staring aghast at these old Roman ruins in York, Or was that Wales?

The thing is, you see, I wasn't really aghast at the Roman ruins. I just look aghast because I was a nervous wreck from having spent the whole day driving on the wrong side of the road, the way they do in England, so naturally I look startlingly like my Uncle Phil, who has been dead nearly 40 years.

Well, the joke is, I'd gone to England to relax after the doctor in New York said I was a nervous wreck, so there I am looking 40 years graveworn. How can you relax in a place where everybody drives on the wrong side of the road? You wouldn't get the humor of the situation from the snaoshor alone, of course, but you've got to admit that's a pretty clear picture of the Roman ruin.

Anyhow, that's enough of the snapshots, I doo't want to bore you with them. The mystery to me is why tourists take snapshots in the first place, since you can't get anyone to look at them when you get home. And there must be millions and millions of snapshots being taken every hour, none of which will ever he looked at hy anybody hur the taker. Of course most places don't photograph as interestingly as England. I'd never take snapshots of places like the redwood forests of California, or like China. My former friend Arlen, who went to both these places, once trapped me by his fireplace during a blizzard, which made it impossible to escape an entire suitcase full of snapshots he'd taken of redwood pagodas.

That was eight years ago. I haven't seen Arien since. They say he's afraid I'll retaliate hy showing him snapshots I took during my vacatioo in Cleveland in 1976.

If be were to drop in this very moment I wouldn't even insist that he look at this snapshot of me standing in the morning fog outside Durham Cathedral. The cathedral well, you really ought to see it. It's too bad the fog was so dense that morning, but it's that grayish mass over my left shoulder.

The point of the picture, though, is that I look so relaxed that I mean to send a copy to my doctor. The irony of it is, I wasn't relaxed at all.

Because Durham, you see, is a very old town with very narrow streets. Streets no wider than a love seat. And I'd tried to make a Uturn in one, you see, and of course the car got wedged tightly between buildings on either side of the street, and the police finally asked if I was an imbecile or just an American, and when I said, "American, they told me to go see the cathedral while they tried to free the car.

In other words, I'm not actually relaxed at all in the snapshot, but actually near a nervous collapse. The relaxed look is because the fog is obliterating the deep tension wrinkles in my face.

For the benefit of all friends and relatives who are reluctant to drop by and say, "Welcome home," let me say that I am burning all my snapshots this afternoon. All except 30 or 40 that are really awfully

Leaves

Linked to Decay of Protein, May Provide Clue to Aging in Man

By Walter Sullivan New York Times Service

ODAY, as in all past au-L tumns, millions upon millions of leaves are being transformed from green to a multitude of heilliant yellows, scarlets and russets. But a new interest has been awakened in the process; some researchers now see in it possible clues to aging, not only in plants but in animals — including man. While some of the most basic steps in the changing of leaf color are not yet understood, recent research has uncovered tantalizing details. It has long been known that autumnal color changes result from a breakdown of chlorophyll, the green substance in leaves. It now appears that this occurs when proteins to which the chlorophyll molecules are bound break up ioto the amino acids of which they are formed. When the chlorophyll is no longer bound to a protein, it disintegrates, losing its green color.

The amino acids resulting from breakup of the proteins are transported through tiny "sieve tubes" into the stems and roots, where their nitrogen is conserved for use in the next season.

According to Kenneth V. Thimann, professor of biology at the University of California in Santa Cruz, a similar breakdown of proteins is characteristic of the aging process in elderly people, who tend to lose protein faster than they can replace it.

"Plants are awfully careful with their nitrogen," he said last week. By storing it they are able to have sufficient nitrogen for re-growth in the spring. To produce new leaves through photosynthesis, he pointed out, plants get plenty of carbon from carbon dioxide in the air and hydrogen from water taken up through their roots. Though gaseous nitrogen makes up almost 80 percent of air, it cannot be used directly by plants. It must first be "fixed" by incorporation into compounds, such as nitrates, which the plants then derive from the soil or, in the case of legumes, from nitrogen-fixing bacteria on

As pointed out by Eduardo Zeiger, professor of biology at Stanford University, healthy

'ages" steadily.

Even in summer months, Thimann noted, there is a partial breakdown of chlorophyll as it performs its photosynthetic role in sunlight, but it is restored during the darkness. Consequently aves are imperceptibly greener in the morning than at sundown.

In the course of many years of research at Harvard and subsequently at Santa Cruz, Thimann has shown that another factor, rather than chlorophyll hreakdown, is responsible for the bril-liant reds of autumn in maples, sumac and many other plants. This is the accumulation of sugar in the leaves and its conversion, through a chain of complex reactions, into a red pigment known as anthocyanin.

The cool nights of autumn inhibit the flow of sugar out of the leaves. At the same time, brilliant sunshine promotes sugar synthesis and its transformation into anthocyanin. An early due to the process was the observation that water plants, such as the duckweeds that float on many ponds, turn red when placed in sugary water and exposed to bright hight active to the end.

Because autumn tends to be cloudier in Europe than in the United States, fall days are less brilliant and nights less cool. As a result, maples transplanted to Europe often do not become as brilliantly red. Ever since the birth of botany, scientists have wondered what initiates the color changes in anturnn leaves. Is it cool weather, desiccation, long nights or some inhorn timer? According to Zeiger, "Whoever answers that question will win a big prize." He and Thimam both suspect that a combination of factors may be the answer.

In a cine bearing on the mystery of aging, Zeiger has found that whatever initiates it in a leaf does not affect all its chlorophyll. It breaks down steadily in the inner tissue, sandwiched between the leaf's top and bottom layers. the leaf surfaces, however, chlorophyll in guard cells con-trolling the entrances to leaf

In seeking to learn whether the aging is controlled by a hormone, scientists have tried to explore the action of substances that retard senescence. Such slowing, it has been found, is produced by a group of growth hormones, known as cytokinins, that stimu-late various forms of plant development. Their mode of action, however, is unknown.

Aging in plants can also be turned off. As some of them become taller, their lower leaves are first shaded, then die and are shed, permitting vigorous growth to be concentrated in the upper part of the plant.

Zeiger's work was described in part in the journal Science, in an article he wrote with Amnon Schwartz. He elaborated upon it last week in a telephone interview. Why the signal that initiates aging affects the inner reguard cells is the key question, he

Gary Chafetz, 36, of Boston, four other Americans and 14 Egyptian geologists and laborers plan to link up with three leased camels that will pull $50,000 worth of radar units across a 120-squaremile patch of the great sand sea near the Siwa Oasis. The radar equipment will detect any foreign objects in the sand up to a depth of 10 meters (33 feet). "We're going to stay in the desert about five months until the middle of March, because then we will be chased out by the same winds that destroyed the army," he said. Cambyses, son of Cyrus the Great, conquered Egypt's Pharaonic dynasty in 525 B.C., and dispatched an army from the ancient Egyptian capital of Thebes, now known as Luxor, for the temple and oracle of Amun at Siwa Oasis, 625 miles to the northwest. They planned to sack the temple site. But, according to the Greek historian Herodotus, citing the people of Siwa, "a southerly wind of extreme violence drove the sand over them in heaps as they were aking their mid-day meal, so that they disappeared forever." He-rodoms said the army consisted of 50,000 troops, but Chafetz estimates a more realistic number is 30,000 - a third of them soldiers and the rest slaves, concubines, children, smiths, technicians, soothsayers, hostages and drivers. Chafetz said that the wind in which the army perished was the "kham-. sin" - a powerful, hot, dry storm that sweeps across the desert dur-

Cecil Parkiason, 52, trade secretary of Britian, will not be asked to resign even though he has admired resign even though he has admitted to a love affair with his former secretary, who is expecting his child in January. A government spokes-man said Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher "takes the view that this is a private matter. Mr. Parkinson is a member of the Cabinet, doing a good job and the question of his resignation does not and will not arise." Parkinson made his admission Wednesday night, ending several days of speculation arising from a report in the satirical magazine Private Eye that Sara Keays was expecting a baby. Parkinson said he had wanted to marry Keays but has gone back to his wife and the couple's three daughters "to keep our family together."

Tom McNally has abandoned his attempt to set a record for the smallest bout to cross the Atlantic Ocean and is aboard a Soviet trawler, Britain's Press Association news agency said Thursday. McNally, 40, had resumed his voyage from Newfoundland to Plymouth after being given food and water by a Russian ship which took him 2 aboard 920 miles off the English coast last week. The Press Association report said it was not clear what happened after that, but another Russian trawler, the Yurikos tikov, picked him up. His 6-foot, 10-inch boat, brought aboard with McNally, had no sails and was reported to be badly damaged.

Quote - Erskine Caldwell, who will be 80 in December, on the film version of "Tobacco Road" made : :hy John Ford, during a stopover in Paris enroute to a writers' conference in Nice: "Instead of the social tragedy I wrote that movie is a folk farce with Jeeter Lester and his = :2 clan, having lost their farm, merrily dancing to the poorhouse singing and Anthony Burgess will join him
